Group orders county sheriff to provide security at meeting

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A group planning to convene a commonlaw court session next week at the Statehouse ordered the local sheriff to provide security against the "renegade" state government.

The group also sent a letter to U.S. Sen. Sam Brownback, asking how to initiate military court martial proceedings against Gov. Bill Graves and legislative leaders.

The letter said the officials should be tried for "overthrowing our republican form of government."

The letter, signed by a society leader, said, "It is my understanding in a military court the punishment for those guilty of treason is hanging."

The Kansas Territorial Agricultural Society contends Graves, legislators and other state officials have no legal authority to hold office. It has long contended they have not signed proper oaths of office, as required by law.

The society plans to convene what it calls a "constitutional court" next Wednesday in the Old Supreme Court Chamber on the Capitol's third floor. The leader who signed the letter claims to act "by authority of the Supreme Court of Christian Jurisdiction."

Legislative leaders decided Wednesday to rescind permission for the society to meet in the Statehouse. The society had permission for an August meeting before legislative staff knew it would convene a "court" session.

The society sent a letter to Shawnee County Sheriff Dave Meneley, ordering him to deputize all Capitol security for a "posse comitatus." The term is Latin for "power of the county."

An anti-government group with a history of confrontations with officials goes by the same name.

Both letters to Brownback and Meneley are signed by Mark Kline Drake, the society's treasurer. Drake has sent documents to Graves and legislative leaders on behalf of his own "Christian court."

Drake's letter to Meneley said that if the sheriff does not provide security, his name will be submitted for court martial.

"The charge will be treason," Drake said in his letter. "Your past history shows you will not perform your duties or honor your word. We are in the process of preparing for lawful security."

Meneley did not return a telephone call.

Brownback's spokesman, Bob Murray, said the senator has not seen the letter that was sent to him. He said Brownback's staff will treat it like others from constituents, which usually are referred to government agencies.

"We respond to every constituent request we get, and some are more off the mainstream than others," Murray said.

Legislative leaders planned to tell the society in a letter that it no longer has permission to meet in the Old Supreme Court Chamber on the Capitol's third floor. In fact, the doors to the chamber probably will remain locked on the days of the meeting.

"If they lock us out, they've closed the meeting," said the society's president, Franklin Dee Williams, a Topeka resident. "Only the people who called the meeting can close the meeting."

The leaders concluded that an August meeting of the "court," sponsored by the society, violated a policy of the Legislative Coordinating Council governing the use of Statehouse rooms. The LCC, which consists of the leaders, handles administrative matters for the Legislature.

Rep. Susan Wagle, R-Wichita, the House speaker pro tem, said the latest letters add to her concerns that "we're dealing with an extremely unreasonable group of people who want to take the law into their own hands."

One document sent earlier by Drake ordered Emil Lutz, the director of legislative services, to supply U.S. and Kansas flags without gold fringe.

The "writ" said gold fringe denotes an illegal military government and, therefore, flying one is an act of treason. The "writ" said the penalty for treason is death by hanging.

"The whole bottom line on this: Doesn't our charter allow us to do everything we've done?" Williams said. "They don't even have the authority to be there."

Williams said the society plans to have a peaceful assembly. He said the last "court" session gave participants a chance to review grievances against the government.

"These guys had every ability to be there, and if they didn't like something, they had the ability to point it out," Williams said of the LCC members.

The LCC concluded last month that the society had permission to meet, but not a "court." LCC members also said the meeting was not educational.

The society contends the "court" educates members about the illegitimacy of state and federal governments and the actions of their "pretended" officials.

During the August "court" session, a "jury" declared that a federal judge in Wichita was guilty of treason in his handling of a case involving tax protesters.

Author uses poetry as his medium to reflect on boyhood, cowboy games

BRANDI HERTIG
staff writer

Jonathan Holden considers himself an artist, but the media he uses to create his works aren't the conventional tactile materials other artists use.

The poet-in-residence prefers to use words to mold his ideas into tangible forms.

"The artist is a maker, just as the potter makes things," Holden said.

In his latest book, "Guns and Boyhood in America: A Memoir of Growing up in the '50s," Holden welds together prose and poetry pieces to present a glimpse of boyhood during an era of cowboy fantasies and cap-gun collections.

The opening chapter of the book discusses Holden's fascination with the loud CRACK! of guns as a child, and the games he and his friends would play.

One line of the chapter reads, "When dying in make-believe, I suddenly felt like a grown-up."

When playing "guns," as he called it, most of the other children didn't want to be the one to play dead, so Holden took it upon himself to play the critically wounded victim.

"It's the kind of thing grown-ups do — they sacrifice themselves," he explained.

Holden described his motivation for writing — he has penned 16 books of several different genres under his belt — as the urge to make things.

An English major in college, Holden said he quickly realized it was far more honorable and glamorous to be a poet rather than just study other poets.

"Like any artist, one wants to make the things that one is studying," he said.

Holden cited a quote from poet Robert Frost to describe the process of writing poetry: "The figure is the same for love. It begins in the light, it inclines to the impulse and it finds a course of lucky events."

Richard Hugo's "The Anxious Fields of Play," an essay about his boyhood playing baseball, was the impetus for Holden's memoir.

"I thought, 'I could do that.' So I began writing about my own boyhood, inspired by that essay," Holden said.

The poetry and prose in "Guns and Boyhood" are two types of writing Holden said are equally difficult to create. Holden describes poetry as a somewhat confessional art, often leaving its author exposed. However, he said he believes there is a limit to how much an author should be willing to share.

"I've always been a confessional writer, but I wouldn't use the sordid aspects of my life for art.

"There are things which ordinary decorum suggests are not good to write about. For example, there are no good poems about excrement," he said.

Holden said his life isn't very exciting, an aspect he enjoys. He calls upon his own creativity to spark ideas.

"I live in my head a great deal and invent things," he said.

BSU alumni offer advice

AMY BICKEL
staff reporter

Members of Black Student Union looked to alumni for answers in a discussion Saturday for the Black Student Union Alumni Reunion.

Students asked the alumni to share ways they would suggest preparing for the post-college, real-world atmosphere.

Some of the concerns students had included networking job contacts and exploring options about continuing their education after their bachelor's degrees.

"For the rest of your life, you are being educated," Cornell Mayfield, an alumnus said. "You need to get as much knowledge as you can and network with different people."

Alumni said they didn't know how important it was to make contacts in their field of major or to make financial decisions while they were in college.

"It's highly competitive out there," Sam Mathis, an alumnus, said.

"Education doesn't stop after college. Learn how to deal with other people and network with them."

Alumni also said students should utilize their time as much as possible and get involved in different organizations.

By doing this, students would learn additional interview and communication skills that might lead to even more opportunities.

"When I first came to a BSU meeting, a speaker looked around at our group and said 'When the semester ends, some of you won't be here.'

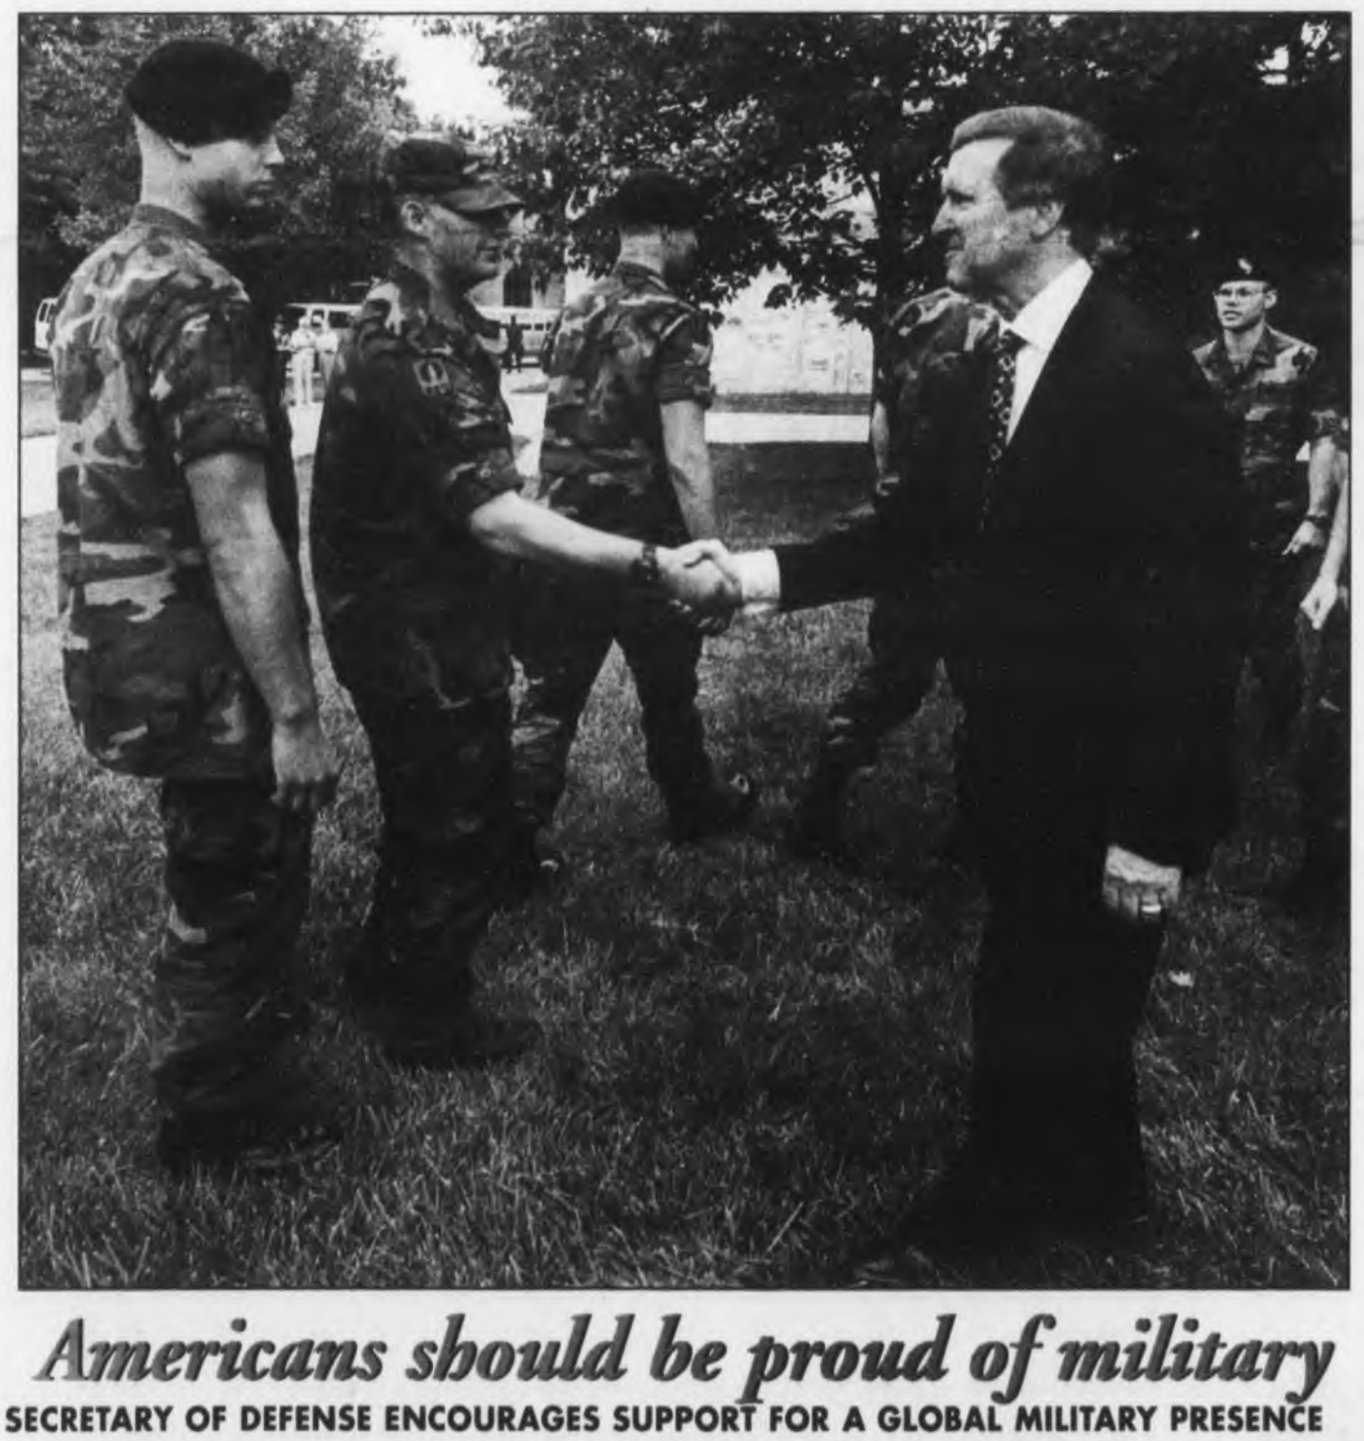
"It was something I really took in. Don't lose focus. Have a plan, a goal, your purpose. Get involved," Joy Grey, an alumna said.

Many alumni were impressed with the values the students expressed during the meeting.

Mathis said he was amazed students were so involved with the campus and were already thinking about their futures.

"It impresses me the values these students have placed on networking. That is a good start for them. They're getting prepared," he said.

BSU president Colette McLemore, senior in social science, said the discussion session was a great experience for students.



"To be able to talk to past and previous members has been terrific. We saw what career moves we might have to make out of college, and it was nice to see how they were so successful," she said.

MEMBERS OF Black Student Union participated in dialogue with black alumni Saturday morning in the K-State Student Union Cornell Mayfield, 1970 graduate in history and resident of Manhattan was one of the alumni who spoke about networking for jobs and being active on campus.

Americans should be proud of military

SECRETARY OF DEFENSE ENCOURAGES SUPPORT FOR A GLOBAL MILITARY PRESENCE

BY TRAVIS D. LENKNER

U.S. Secretary of Defense William Cohen used the 110th address of the Landon Lecture Series to encourage civilian support for the armed forces and to promote a sensible global military presence.

Cohen, a former Republican senator, was sworn in as defense secretary in January. He spoke to the crowd of about 1,750 about the necessity of a national pride in the military.

"It's this military, made up of people willing to give life and limb for all of us, that makes us the most powerful, and I would say the most enviable, nation in the world," Cohen said.

The role of the military during peacetime is crucial to the nation, Cohen said.

"Today's military is serving to shape the world for the better. In actions that are both sensible and selfless, they are bringing stability to more regions and democracy to more nations," he said.

Cohen said he knows the military isn't without its problems, citing recent sexual harassment issues raised by female soldiers. Still, he said the actions of a select few should not affect public opinion.

"In an organization this large and this diverse, there are always going to be problems. If the military were a city, it would be the sixth largest in America, just behind Philadelphia. Would we define Philadelphia just by the actions of a few problem citizens?" he asked. "Would you allow a few problem students, if you have them, to define your university?"

"(Problems) have occurred in the ranks, but those breaches of faith are the exception, not the rule," Cohen said.

America's role as a superpower was the other focus of Cohen's 45-minute address. While the United States should be selective about its foreign involvements, it shouldn't sit quietly when other nations are in need, Cohen said.

"We can't afford to zip ourselves into a continental cocoon and watch the world develop on CNN," he said.

Though the United States isn't at war, Cohen said, the military is essential to preserve peace. The armed forces are currently active in more than 100 countries, all of which play a role in national security, he said. And, though he understands arguments that the military should cut back its foreign involvement, Cohen said those critics might feel differently if a cutback in involvement led to war.

"It's been said that peace is like oxygen," he said. "When you have it, you don't think about it, but when you don't have it, it's all you think about."

Cohen defended U.S. involvement during a question-and-answer session after the speech, when one audience member accused the military of action as "social workers with shotguns."

"We can't seal our country off from the rest of the world," he said. "It would be nice to live in George Washington's time, when he had the Atlantic Ocean to protect him from enemies, but technology has eliminated all that. The

Upcoming

Past president hopeful Phil Gramm, a three-term Republican senator from Texas, will deliver the 111th Landon Lecture at 2 p.m. Oct. 17 in McCain Auditorium.

Gramm is the co-author of several landmark bills to reduce federal spending and cut the U.S. deficit. He was among several Republican candidates who sought the GOP nomination in 1996. He eventually dropped out the race and endorsed Bob Dole.

Elected to the U.S House of Representatives in 1978 as a Democrat, Gramm resigned from Congress in 1983 after being denied a seat on the House Budget Committee by Democratic leaders because he co-authored President Ronald Reagan's economic program. Gramm won back his House seat as a Republican a month after resigning.

Gramm has successfully supported legislation to double the strength of the U.S. Border Patrol and welfare reform. He also pushed for approval of a balanced budget amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Career Fair preparation made easier

BYRON VOGEL
staff reporter

Now is the time to begin planning your visit to the Career Fair, and doing so just got easier.

The Career and Employment Services' website, www.ksu.edu/ces, now features volumes of facts and tips about the Career Fair.

The Career Fair is scheduled to be from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Tuesday Sept. 16 in the K-State Student Union.

Check out on the World Wide Web.
Career and Employment Services' web site is located at www.ksu.edu/ces.

As of Sept. 4, Career and Employment Services had reserved 235 tables for employers registered to participate in the Career Fair. This number could reach as high as 249, said Marcia Schuley, Career and Employment Services' associate director.

As chairwoman for the Career Fair, Schuley filtered the names of all participating employers onto separate links that correspond with specific curricula.

"You can click on your college, and it will bring up a screen with an alphabetized list of all the employers related to your college," Schuley said. "This way students won't have

Accounts proposed for emergency use

ZACH VADER
staff reporter

A bill creating two accounts comprised of excess student fees was introduced in Student Senate Thursday.

The Campus Fee Adjustment account and the Campus Fee Reserve account are scheduled to be voted on at the next Senate meeting. The bill must receive two-thirds of the Senate's votes for approval.

Aaron Otto, Privilege Fee Committee chair, said the accounts will be good for the future students of K-State.

"Before the linear concept of tuition and hours, everyone got so much money per student. Now there is a quota to maintain and it is a good idea to have these accounts as a back-up," he said.

If approved, excess funds will be placed into the adjustment account until 2.5 percent of the privilege fee budget — which is $8.3 million for 1997-98 — has been accumulated. Otto said once the Campus Fee Adjustment has reached its goal of 2.5 percent, excess money will be put into a reserve account.

Otto said the adjustment account will be used if the funds available for privilege fee allocation drops because of enrollment-related decreases. He said the account will ensure that funded departments get their share of the student activities fees if something drastic happens to enrollment.

Stealth fighter crashes into house; at least 4 injured

MIDDLE RIVER, Md. — An F-117 stealth fighter that was performing in an air show crashed into a house shortly after takeoff Sunday, leaving the house in flames and at least four injuries on the ground.

The pilot ejected safely, and there were no immediate reports of deaths.

The plane went down just after 3 p.m. during a performance at the Chesapeake Air Show at the Glen Martin State Airport, said Baltimore Fire Capt. Steve Gisriel. He said it crashed into a condo-marina complex on Chesapeake Bay in this suburb northeast of Baltimore, and all four people injured were believed to be in the complex.

Air Force spokesman Capt. Byron James confirmed that the F-117 went down and that the pilot ejected, but had no other information.

F-117 stealth fighters, armed with laser-guided bombs, were used in the Gulf War against the most heavily defended Iraqi targets because of their ability to evade radar and radar-guided missiles.

Stealth technology uses curved or angular surfaces, known as a cross section, to reduce radar reflection. When combined with radar-absorbing composite materials, a plane with a 43-foot wingspan displays the cross section of a bumblebee.

Soup kitchen gets grant to help homeless learn to cook

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A soup kitchen has won a $5,000 grant to teach homeless and unemployed people to cook, helping them get jobs at schools, restaurants, hospitals, hotels and riverboats.

The Kansas City Community Kitchen, which serves more than 5,000 lunches a month out of Grace & Holy Trinity Cathedral, will work with the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception and Harvesters, the community food bank.

The program will be patterned after a Washington, D.C.-based kitchen that has trained more than 150 people in the last five years. About 75 percent of those people remain employed.

A professional chef teaches people how to prepare meals, which are sold to social agencies and schools throughout the city.

Jane Tally, the soup kitchen's director, hopes to provide uniforms and pay trainees while they learn culinary skills. She also hopes to enlist other agencies to provide transportation and daycare for the trainees.

Twelve programs across the country are receiving the grants.

Some return to homes as waters begin to recede in Dodge City

DODGE CITY, Kan. — Some of the more than 100 people who fled their houses after heavy thunderstorms caused flooding returned home Saturday.

But several streets were still blocked off, and many of those who were evacuated were not expected to be back in their homes until Sunday morning, said Dorothy Faulkner, law enforcement spokeswoman.

"We had rain and rain and rain," Faulkner said, including water in her own basement for the first time since 1965.

There were no reports of injuries. Preliminary damage estimates were about $1 million.

Radar estimates indicated 4 to 7 inches of rain fell around this southwestern Kansas city of about 30,000 people. The heaviest rainfall was reported just south of town, the National Weather Service said.

Most damage to homes was to garage doors and carpets, and a furniture store suffered about $150,000 in damage. No injuries to livestock were reported.

She said 137 people spent the night at an emergency shelter and many others stayed with friends or relatives. About 60 were still at the shelter on Saturday, she said.

The National Guard, which sent nine people and three trucks to help with the evacuation, left about noon on Saturday.

Corrections
CLARIFICATIONS

In an article titled "Two jobs keep new adviser busy," in Friday's edition of the Collegian, a mistake was made. The article discussed Tamara Abdulhaqq's roles as an adviser for K-State's Black Pan-Hellenic Council and assistant director of the constituent programs for the KSU Alumni Association. In the fourth paragraph, Abdullhaqq's work to prepare "colored students" for the medical exam for the Health Careers Pathway Program should have read "students of color." The Collegian editors and staff regret this error.

Oldest living black graduate honored for his example

John L. Wilson, 1923 graduate in general sciences and resident of Ottawa, Kan. has devoted his life to the education of others.

As the oldest living black graduate of K-State, Wilson was honored in Farrell Library's Hemisphere room Saturday afternoon by students, faculty, staff and alumni on campus for the Black Alumni and Greek Reunion.

"It was a great day," Wilson said. "They gave me a lot of love."

At K-State, Wilson was an active member of Phi Beta Sigma and has remained instrumental in maintaining the fraternity. He also studied music and played piano and organ in the AME church of Manhattan.

Wilson is still able to utilize the three-manual organ and small upright piano inside his Ottawa home, which his father purchased in 1903.

After K-State, he earned a master's degree in organic chemistry from the University of Kansas and a doctorate in education from Indiana.

Wilson was an educator during the 40s, 50s and early 60s and was dean of two black institutions in Arkansas and Florida.

Freeman Davis, development officer at the KSU Foundation, spoke with Tamara Abdulhaqq, assistant director of constituent programs for the K-State Alumni Association, in honor of Wilson.

"This allowed for a moment to recognize his physical presence and wish him a happy birthday a few days early," Davis said. "To my knowledge, he may be the oldest living graduate of this university."

Wilson will turn 97 on Sept. 28. He will also be honored on Oct. 1 as the first black male graduate from Ottawa High School.

The emotional reception for Wilson Saturday brought tears and standing ovations from the audience.

"I think it was a very special moment. I was very moved by this man," Davis said. "He is still standing up for morals and principles. Not only did he graduate from K-State but he went on to make a tremendous impact on young people."

Davis also accompanied Wilson on a tour of the library and said he enjoyed the time he shared with a man who devoted 50-plus years to education.

"It's different than when I was there, but it seemed a lot better and a lot bigger," Wilson said. "I wanted to go to college, and my father said K-State was the place to go."

Members of Black Student Union and alumni shared an appreciation for Wilson's accomplishments as well as chronological age, Davis said.

Formerly a staff member in Multicultural Student Organization and adviser for K-State National Pan-Hellenic Council, Davis devotes 85 percent of his time to developing a new fund titled Multicultural Education Initiative.

This campus-wide fund is creating resources backing programs and initiatives to address retention and recruitment of multicultural faculty at K-State.

"When you start getting back into the 20s, you can count the number of black students on one hand or two," Davis said.

Alumni can offer wisdom and example, and Davis said students of all races, cultures and social backgrounds should recapture the value of elders who paved the way before them.

"They have a wealth of history, impact and role-modeling still to offer other generations," Davis said. "This man is just one representative we have."

Sorority pledges learn self defense during workshop

The Panhellenic Council sponsored its first new member workshop for all sorority pledge members Sunday.

Hosted by an executive council of seven sorority members, the workshop was designed to inform and educate new members about K-State greek life and what it has to offer.

Jennifer Gorman, president of Panhellenic Council, said she was excited about helping new members during the workshop.

"This workshop is an orientation to greek life and what it's like to be a part of the greek community," Gorman said.

GREEK LIFE

The workshop began with a seminar on self defense led by Dave Portnoy, president of the Women's Rights Group. Panhellenic members said they felt self-defense sessions were necessary for all women, especially the new members.

"It's important to be aware of your surroundings and to know what to do in a given situation," Gorman said.

Following the speaker, new members spent the rest of the afternoon participating in three different discussion groups. Some of the topics included Home-coming, community service and risk management.

Members of Panhellenic hope the new members benefit from the workshop and that it will help start their K-State experience on the right foot, Gorman said.

"This being a new program for us, we're making an effort to educate the new members about the greek community in addition to what they're learning in their individual chapters," Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said.

Discussing topics the new members will be confronted with while in college, the group stressed the benefits of belonging to a sorority and all it can offer them.

Panhellenic members said belonging to a sorority offers many opportunities to get involved on campus and in the community.

Not only was Panhellenic optimistic about the workshop, but some new member educators were excited as well.

"Since we haven't done this in the past, it's a great new addition to the new member program," Courtney Agan, junior in family studies and human services, said. "It's good for them to get to know about the campus and to interact with girls in other houses."

Gorman said the workshop would be an excellent place for new members to learn about college issues as freshmen, instead of having to learn the hard way later on.

Be sure to love your K-State alumni — you'll be one someday

Like little gnomes roaming through the forest, K-State's alumni are working their magic on our university without our even realizing it.

The Black Student Union stepped up this weekend by honoring John L. Wilson, one of the oldest living black alumni. Wilson has contributed significantly to education throughout the years and has also spent 50-plus years as an educator himself.

By showing him their appreciation, BSU let Wilson, and all alumni, know that K-State students are grateful for contributions made by those who have come before us.

Alumni secretly sprinkle money into scholarship funds, and are always eager to make sure the good ol' boys on the football team want for nothing.

And speaking of tossing the old pigskin around, this is the time of year when a plethora of alumni can be seen kicking it around various places in Manhattan. Because they know the ins and outs of being a struggling student, they are generally better tippers and more polite in restaurants than current students. This is something student who are waiters and waitresses can certainly appreciate.

Sen. Pat Roberts, a K-State alumnus, attended the Landon Lecture Friday, showing his unwavering support for his alma mater. And we're willing to bet if we called up ol' Pat and told him we were from K-State, he'd sure be happy to talk to us for a spell.

Many alumni are valuable resources to various campus organizations, helping students through what they have already done some years before. This is the kind of dedication that helps students succeed.

Like every caterpillar becomes a butterfly, all students will eventually become alumni. Looking at and appreciating what the alumni do for us now will help us to be ideal alumni for future K-Staters.

Our contributions to this university extend beyond the years we spend squirming in uncomfortable desks and eating Ramen noodles. Hopefully after we graduate, we can give back as much as we take now.

UPC Activities Carnival presents students with many opportunities to get involved

ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI
staff reporter

More than 100 K-State clubs and organizations participated in the 41st-annual Union Program Council Activities Carnival on Sunday in the K-State Student Union.

Organized by the UPC Promotions Committee, the carnival gave students an opportunity to learn about some of the clubs and organizations available to them at K-State.

The carnival, which took place from 4 to 7 p.m., attracts approximately 4,000 students every year, Tiffany Pollard, UPC promotions chairwoman, said.

"It's an excellent opportunity for the entire student population," Pollard said.

While the Flints Hills Aikido of KSU gave demonstrations and UPC members handed out free hotdogs and cotton candy, students talked with group members and gathered brochures, flyers and meeting-time information.

"There is a niche for everyone," Pollard said. "It's a great way to get involved."

The carnival provided students with a way to talk with different campus groups and find out if there are clubs that fit their interests.

"Being here on campus for a year you get to see some of the activities, but the carnival makes it really easy to find out about a lot of different groups and get signed up for them," Kellie McClellan, sophomore in English and journalism education, said.

The carnival also benefitted the organizations that participate. For many, it gave them an opportunity to let students know more about their group and recruit new members.

"A lot of people who came last year ended up running for council and being elected. It really helps us publicize ourselves," said Jennifer Redetzke, senior in elementary education and member of the Education Council.

American Civil Liberties Union Vice President Jeri Blaske said the carnival was a good way for groups to get information out to the student population. The carnival helps increase their membership size and helps them reach more students about legal issues and rights, Blaske said.

For many students the carnival presented their first chance to start getting involved and the beginning of new interests and leadership roles.

Hank Doering, freshman in biology, said he found several organizations to get involved with.

"It's set up rather well and you can find lots of stuff," Doering said. "I'm just trying to find out what's all going on."

New minor available in leadership studies

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

A reception and informational meeting took place Friday afternoon to educate students about the new minor in leadership studies at K-State.

Students attending also had a chance to brainstorm for the future of the leadership studies minor program.

Susan Scott, associate dean of student life and director of leadership studies and programs, said this new minor could be the pathway to a major in leadership.

Scott said as of Friday, there were more than 40 students signed up to minor in leadership studies. Those involved included freshmen and upperclassmen.

Discussion during the meeting included the idea of creating a mentoring program within the minor to allow freshmen to work with older students and then with faculty or business persons as they continue in the minor.

Students involved in leadership studies minors also discussed what they expected of the minor, experiences and why they were thankful for the new minor.

"I'm in the 211 Intro to Leadership Concepts class, and I got a leadership scholarship to come to K-State," said Audrey Umphenour, freshman in agriculture business and minoring in leadership studies. "In that class I've learned everything I wanted to know. They sparked my interest."

Robert Shoop, professor of educational administration and leadership, said cooperative leadership should be stressed.

Shoop said it is important to develop concepts, theories and backgrounds, and then use these to find out how to make a pathway to a successful career.

Shoop and Scott spoke of their ideas briefly, and then opened up the floor to student comments and questions. They stressed the importance of student suggestions and involvement.

Shoop said the minor in leadership studies program will be seeking funding for current minors as well as in the future.

"There's no membership fee for being a leadership minor," Shoop said.

A leadership studies minor requires six hours of core courses and 12 additional hours from a list of acceptable courses that may be obtained through the office of leadership studies and programs.

Students wishing to minor in leadership studies can contact Shoop or Scott.

New Miss America's platform deals with AIDS education, prevention

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. — With her eyes on Broadway and her hands on a mop, Kate Shindle never let go of her dream to become Miss America.

It finally came true Saturday night.

"It's a little bit overwhelming," Shindle said on Sunday. "Just a short while ago I was just another college student."

Six months ago, the Northwestern University theater major was working as a janitor at Gus Giordano's Dance Center in Evanston, Ill., in exchange for free dance lessons. On Sunday, she was surrounded by a mob of photographers and television cameras as she began her year-long reign as Miss America 1998.

Shindle won a Miss America Pageant that was quite different from those in years past. The biggest change was contestants were allowed to wear two-piece suits for the first time since 1947 — and for the first time on television. The pageant was first televised in 1954.

The suits were more popular with the judges than they were with the contestants. Only 13 of the 51 contestants chose to wear them, but five made the top 10 and three were in the top five.

The 5-foot-11 inch, 20-year-old, who wore a black two-piece trimmed in red, sang "Don't Rain On My Parade" from the movie "Funny Girl" in the talent competition.

And she won before a home-state crowd. A New Jersey native whose parents live in nearby Moorestown, Shindle went to high school with Miss New Jersey Kathy Nejat. She moved to Illinois to go to college and competed in the Miss Chicago Pageant three times — losing each time — before winning Miss Lake-Cook and then Miss Illinois.

"I can't (ever) remember not wanting to be Miss America, since I was very young," she said.

Shindle

She worked three days a week at the dance studio as a janitor during the last academic year so she could get free dance lessons and improve her shot at Broadway.

"They were looking for someone to clean the mirrors and vacuum and sweep and mop the tap room, and I can do that," Shindle said.

Along with the title of Miss America comes a $40,000 college scholarship and the prospect of more than $100,000 in appearance fees. Shindle said her AIDS awareness promotion will focus on prevention and education.

She favors giving condoms out in high schools but opposes providing needles to addicts to stem the spread of the deadly disease.

She said abstinence is the only truly foolproof method of preventing sexual transmission of the disease but acknowledged that it may not be realistic for teen-agers.

"We need to recognize that, and not to try to convince ourselves that we can talk kids out of having sex, but rather meet them where they are and talk to them about the best ways they can make their behavior safer," she said.

The pageant telecast, which moved to ABC this year after 30 years at NBC, featured changes big and small — and a few glitches. Besides allowing two-piece swimsuits, the pageant brought in new hosts, scrapped its unsuccessful viewer call-ins and hired TV journalist Nancy Glass to interview the finalists on stage.

The on-screen graphics identifying the contestants as they introduced themselves onstage did not work and were eliminated almost immediately.

Later, during the swimsuit competition, the narrator identified Miss Arizona Stacey Momeyer as Miss Oregon Tamara Ann Finch and vice versa. The hosts corrected the mistake after a commercial break and said the judges had also been told.

RED ZONE SHUTDOWN

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — As the final seconds ticked away and Buffalo's Todd Collins took dead aim at the Kansas City end zone, Elvis Grbac thought about the previous Monday night.

"My mind was saying, 'I don't want to feel like the Raiders,'" said the Chiefs' quarterback, the toast of Kansas City all week after hitting a 32-yard pass in the final seconds to beat Oakland.

But the Bills couldn't victimize the Chiefs on Sunday the way Grbac shocked the Raiders.

Given a first-and-goal from the 7 with 27 seconds left, Collins missed three straight passes. Then Mark McMillian intercepted the fourth, preserving Kansas City's 22-16 victory with six seconds left.

"The defense did a great job," said Grbac, who was yelling as loud as anybody in the crowd of 78,169 in the climactic final seconds.

Grbac, given good protection most of the day, threw a 1-yard touchdown strike to Tony Richardson with 6:55 left to give the Chiefs the lead, setting the stage for the final drama on the other end of the field.

CHANDLER INJURED

ATLANTA — Atlanta Falcons quarterback Chris Chandler, who left last week's game against Carolina with a concussion, was injured again Sunday against Oakland.

Chandler suffered a bruised sternum when he was driven to the turf by Oakland's Darrell Russell with 2:17 remaining in the third quarter. Russell was penalized for roughing the quarterback.

It wasn't immediately known if Chandler would be able to return. He was 16-of-25 for 199 yards and two touchdowns when he was replaced by Billy Joe Tolliver with the Falcons trailing 31-24.

BIG 12 ROUNDUP

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — What a dreadful day for the Big 12.

Colorado gets manhandled. Texas undergoes an annihilation of historic proportion.

K-State, a 23-point favorite, barely wins.

No. 7 Nebraska, an even more overwhelming 43 1/2-point favorite, brings fainting spells to its faithful by trailing Central Florida — yes, Central Florida — at halftime.

Only the unranked, supposed also-rans of the Big 12 avoided either a big scare or an embarrassing loss on a freaky Saturday the 13th.

Nebraska may have been looking so far ahead to its meeting against No. 2 Washington this week that only the Huskers' bodies were still in Lincoln. After falling behind three times in the first half, they finally rallied for a 38-24 victory over their plucky visitors.

No. 20 K-State seemed headed for an easy victory over Ohio after taking its expected 23-0 halftime lead.

But the Bobcats, gunning for their first victory over a ranked foe, fought back and totaled 430 yards before the Wildcats finally held on for a shaky 23-20 win.

At Michigan, No. 15 Colorado was hardly in the game. The No. 8 Wolverines got 258 passing yards from Brian Griese and smothered the Buffs 27-3.

The North Division's biggest loser was hapless Iowa State. The Cyclones gave Minnesota a fight, but couldn't corral Tutu Atwell, and the Golden Gophers wound up 53-29 winners.

The North's biggest winner was Kansas. The unbeaten Jayhawks avenged an embarrassing loss from last year and beat big rival Missouri 15-7, getting Tiger quarterback Corby Jones to fumble twice deep in Jayhawk territory.

In the South and around the country, people are buzzing over UCLA's shocking 66-3 butchery of Texas. The Longhorns fell out of the Top 25 from their previous No. 11 ranking in their worst licking since 1904.

Baylor, Oklahoma and Texas A&M all had the week off.

In the other two South Division games, Zebbie Lethridge threw for three touchdowns and ran for two more as Texas Tech trounced Southwestern Louisiana 59-14

Oklahoma State shut out Fresno State 35-0 as quarterbacks Chris Chaloupka and Tony Lindsay threw a school-record five TD passes between them.

K-STATE wide receiver Gavin Peries catches a 39-yard pass during the K-State vs. Ohio game Saturday evening in KSU Stadium. Peries had two catches for a total of 71 yards.

In K-State's home opener at KSU Stadium Saturday, the Cats found themselves scrapping for a win late in the 4th quarter against Ohio.

JUST HANGING ON

STORY BY SAM FELSENFELD

K-State beat the Ohio Bobcats 23-20 Saturday in their home opener, but aside from the final score, the Wildcats were dominated.

Sure, it was the 35th-consecutive home victory for the Cats over non-ranked opponents. And yes, it was the 26th consecutive-collegiate victory for quarterback Michael Bishop — with no losses.

But, if not for six breaks, the Cats could have lost 34-3 to the Bobcats, who were expected to be one of K-State's easiest opponents of the season.

"We were looking like garbage in every aspect of the game," Eric Hickson, senior running back, said. "Running passing, and kicking. We played like trash tonight, and that's all I can say."

Statistically, Ohio dominated K-State. The Bobcats had more first downs, yards rushing and yards passing. They also led in time of possession and yards per play. But unlike the Cats, Ohio didn't get any breaks.

K-State received its first break of the game when special teams punt returner Lamar Chapman returned a punt 94 yards for a touchdown. The return opened the scoring early in the first quarter, giving the Cats a 7-0 lead after Martin Gramatica kicked the extra point.

Chapman's return set a school record and tied a conference record. But it probably wouldn't have happened without strong blocking, which would have left K-State with seven fewer points on the scoreboard.

"When I caught the ball, I saw a nice little hole on the left side and just hit it," Chapman said.

Later in the first quarter, K-State received another break. This break came from Gramatica, who set a career-high with a 52-yard field goal. And he didn't just squeak by his old record — he topped it by 12 yards.

However, that mark didn't hold up very long. In the second quarter, he set another career-high and tied a conference record when he was successful from 55 yards out.

"If I had a dream," Gramatica said, "I don't think it could be as good as this."

But what was probably K-State's biggest break came on a busted play.

After penalties, a sack and a rush for a loss by Bishop, the Cats faced second-and-52. A quick pass from Bishop to tight end Justin Swift left K-State with third-and-30.

It was then that Cats got their Quarterback position still in question

JESS C. LOUK

By all appearances, the K-State football program has a genuine quarterback controversy on its hands.

Coach Bill Snyder pulled Michael Bishop late in the second quarter of Saturday night's game after Bishop was only able to complete three of 13 passes for 93 yards. Snyder then sent in Jonathan Beasley, but Beasley was equally ineffective, going one of three for 9 yards.

After his unproductive stint under center, Beasley was pulled in the opening minutes of the fourth quarter and Bishop was sent in again.

So K-State now has a quarterback controversy, right? Well, only sort of, if you ask Snyder.

"I don't think there's a controversy. We'll have a No. 1 quarterback," Snyder said. "My intention would be for Michael to start the ball game in two weeks, but like anything else, there is no guarantee of that."

OK, so there is a rejuvenated quarterback controversy. But as of Saturday, Bishop has the inside track on the job and being relieved by Beasley was OK with him.

"I wasn't surprised," Bishop said. "If I wasn't getting the job done, try somebody else."

Bishop originally won the quarterback job from Helm and Beasley in a tightly contested battle. Snyder waited just four days before the season opener against Northern Illinois to announce that Bishop would be the team's starter.

Now that Snyder has thrust Beasley into action, Beasley is no longer eligible to take a redshirt year.

"I was a little bit surprised, but I just had to go out there and do what I could," Beasley said. "The reason Coach took me out was because I wasn't moving the ball like I was supposed to."

Snyder said he opted to play Beasley because of an injury backup quarterback Adam Helm sustained in the Northern Illinois game.

Helm was suited up Saturday night, holding a clipboard and sporting a cast on his right hand.

"He wasn't able to play tonight," Snyder said. "I'm not sure how long Adam will be out. It's just indefinite at this particular point and time."

When Helm returns to practice, there will not only be a battle for the No. 1 job, but the No. 2 position will also be a point of contention. Helm had originally had the inside track on the job because Beasley had an option for a redshirt year, while Helm had High-tech Willie's debut provokes mixed feelings for this football fan

VIEWPOINT

CRESTON KUENZI

CRESTON KUENZI is a junior in computer engineering. You can send your e-mail to Creston at creston@ksu.edu.

The "Willie of the 21st Century" made his first appearance at the Wildcats' home game Saturday night.

I've really got to say that I didn't want to like him. In fact, I tried really hard to hate the new high-tech Willie the Wildcat.

You see, I'm not a big fan of change. I've always been the conservative type who opposes change at all cost.

For me, it's always been peanut butter and grape jelly sandwiches. Never apricot jelly, never honey, never jam. Always grape jelly.

Needless to say, when I found out that they were planning on taking our beloved Willie and changing him, I was appalled.

"How can they do that to the Willie I've known my whole life and change him without at least consulting me first?" I pleaded.

That was followed by a fit of rage involving lots of breaking glass and stomping around the house.

When I heard his picture was in the sports section after making his debut at Fan Appreciation Day, I tore open the paper to see what they had done to my friend William.

At first sight, I was shocked.

"What on earth is up with his gray misshapen head and those pearly white fangs and those weird looking stripes along the side of his neck," I yelled. "Who is this impostor?"

I started to prepare a column that would rip the new Willie to shreds, while imploring the student body to fight along side of me to bring back the old one.

Something happened, though, as I prepared for my story. I studied the new Willie's every feature so that I could attack him from every possible angle, but the more I stared, the more tolerable he became.

I'm now to the point that I'm kind of fond of this new version of our mascot.

He does look more like the Powercat, which is good since that is our logo.

I still think he could have done without the stripes, but I guess I'll get used to them.

For those of you that still aren't convinced, keep in mind that not too many people liked the Powercat when it first came out, either.

In fact, the phrase "Iowa Hawkeye on steroids" was tossed around to describe it, but now the Powercat and K-State are synonymous.

I still have a problem with the fact that we're raffling the old Willie off, though. It's disrespectful.

It's like we're saying, "Thanks for all the great years, old Will, old pal, but you're out of style, so now we're going to squeeze every last penny out of you by raffling you off to one lucky winner."

What really worries me about this is what if some Jayhawk fan ends up winning the raffle?

The thought of Willie being the guest of honor at a bonfire in Lawrence isn't too appealing to me.

We should keep the old Willie around and put him in a glass case in the K-State Student Union or something like that. Hey, if things keep going the way they are for K-State athletics, we're eventually going to need a Hall of Fame on campus.

I can't think of a better way to greet people as they walk in the door, than to have good old Willie the Wildcat standing by the entrance.

Director switches from shopping to art

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

Chris Heavey, former director of the Manhattan Town Center, was appointed interim director of the Manhattan Center for the Arts on Friday.

The appointment capped a week that began on Monday with the resignation of Terrie McCants, who served only one year as director of the arts center.

Don Wissman, chairman of the center's board, said the board reluctantly accepted McCants' resignation.

"I think the demands of the center were very high, and she became exhausted trying to run the center," Wissman said. "She wanted more time to pursue other activities and to spend time with her family."

In the two weeks before McCants resigned, full-time staff members Dale Clore and Jane Gibson quit. Karen Lauseng is the only full-time staff member.

Clore said she had no comment on her decision to quit or whether she would want to come back to the center since McCants resigned.

Wissman said he didn't think the staff resignations could be attributed to staff problems with McCants' management.

McCants assumed the director position in September 1996, after the merger of the Manhattan Arts Council, the Manhattan Civic Theatre and the Manhattan Arts Center into the current arts center at 1520 Poyntz Ave.

"I felt like I had done the job of the transition period and putting things in place to move forward," McCants said. "It's a job that requires a lot of time and energy, and I'm a single parent trying to raise two boys."

McCants said the past year has been difficult, and she needs time to reprioritize. She dismissed notions that her decision to resign was related to the recent staff resignations.

"It's really not related," McCants said. "There were changes that were required. It's important not to comment on staff.

"I think the merger itself has brought a lot of stress. I think there was a lot of identity-based conflict."

McCants said she doesn't think the board would have moved to find a new director had she not resigned.

"You make a lot of decisions and you don't make everyone happy," she said. "I've tried to represent the arts and the overall organization. I've defended the merger strongly. I've represented community arts and not one particular program."

McCants said she thinks the center is positioned well for growth.

"It's in a position now for someone who didn't go through the merger to come in and do some good," she said.

McCants said she is committed to ease the transition with Heavey.

She said, "I think it will be an easy transition and a timely one, but change is hard."

Heavey will serve as interim director through 1997. The board hopes to appoint a new director to begin Jan. 1, 1998.

Wissman said Heavey will bring a high level of managerial skills to the center.

Heavey has served on the center's board since the founding of the center. He resigned from the Town Center over differences with Forest City Enterprises, the Cleveland-based owner of the mall.

"He's a highly dedicated individual to the community," Wissman said.

Wissman said Heavey is planning a community meeting on Sept. 23 at the arts center to discuss programs and to answer questions.

No time had been set for the meeting at press time.

UPC has new screen, sound system

Forum Hall received a new movie screen and sound system over the summer for free.

Network Event Theater provided the equipment to K-State if the Union Program Council agreed to broadcast six of the company's programs a month.

The programs are broadcast via satellite that is also provided from the company and will be free for students to attend.

Paul Donovan, chairman of the NET committee in UPC, said the company contacted the university.

"We called other schools to see if it was a good deal or not, and they all said it was," Donovan said.

The University of Kansas receives and broadcasts NET programming.

"We took a look at the equipment, and it's some nice equipment, so we said yes," Donovan said.

The equipment needed to receive programming and offer it to students was installed in Forum Hall during the summer. The new screen is movie-theater quality and is worth about $15,000. Because Forum Hall was in need of a new system, UPC was happy to have it.

NET programs include a wide variety of things such as concerts, sneak previews of movies, a monthly comedy show, sporting events and first showings of the Spawn animated series. Lectures and HBO events will also be part of the programming broadcasted from the NET satellite.

Because much of it is promotional, the programming will be provided for free to students. In the case of sneak previews, the showings are a way for movie companies to get feedback from an audience before the wide release of the movie.

Donovan said the satellite system is high-tech and allows for some interactive activities.

This month NET is broadcasting a new Oliver Stone movie. After watching the movie, audiences have the chance to talk to Stone and give their input on the film.

There aren't any NET programs booked for Forum Hall yet this semester. By the time NET had the equipment installed and ready to go, the fall schedule for Forum Hall had already been made.

"We don't yet have any programs booked. They only have certain dates they could broadcast, and we only have certain dates that are open," Donovan said. "There should be something this semester."

Donovan said there will be more NET events in the spring. Any broadcasts will be scheduled around the Kaleidoscope and Feature Film committees' schedules.

Greeks dare to get dirty for charities

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

Slime, peanut butter, syrup and fun were on the menu for the first Alpha Chi Omega and Delta Tau Delta Double Dare philanthropy.

The proceeds for the event will benefit the Diabetes Foundation and the United Way.

"Since it was our first year we didn't know what to expect, but I am really pleased with the turn out," Aric Harris, president of Delta Tau Delta, said.

"The event moved very smoothly, which is good because we wanted to give those participating enough time to make it to the football game," Harris said.

The Double Dare competition was an interpretation of the popular Double Dare gameshow for children on Nickelodeon.

Each four-member team had 15 minutes to accumulate as many points as possible. Points were awarded by answering trivia questions. If a team did not know the answer it could impose a dare on the opposing team.

If that dared team did not know the answer it had the option of imposing a double dare, which would then result in a physical challenge.

The physical challenge included team members getting slimy, wet and dirty for points. If a team answered incorrectly, the opposing team was awarded the points.

"The key to winning this competition is strategy and teamwork," Shannon Johnston, president of Alpha Chi Omega, said.

Greeks competed in physical challenges ranging from breaking water balloons with their heads to sponge relays.

The overall winners of the competition were the Pi Beta Phi sorority and the Alpha Tau Omega fraternity. Gamma Phi Beta sorority and Sigma Nu fraternity placed second.

"We're all about having fun and getting dirty for a good cause," Mike Finnegan, sophomore in criminology and Sigma Nu member, said.

Group proposes 7 steps for city

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

Amid all the hype of saving the environment, a new organization called Sustainable Manhattan has evolved. Sustainable Manhattan is trying to broaden the goal of environmental preservation by striving for social and economic preservation as well.

The group defines sustainability as being able to meet the needs of the present without compromising the needs of future generations. This includes preserving the environmental, social and economic aspects of Manhattan.

Jarron Paronto, project coordinator, said although the group has its own goals, most of Sustainable Manhattan's goals will be left up the community.

"We're kind of an umbrella organization to teach and encourage others to do projects to attain sustainability," Paronto said.

He said Sustainable Manhattan is organized around a new way of thinking about community development. They try to integrate social, environmental and economic aspects.

The group stressed the importance of the Golden Rule of doing unto others and extending it through time.

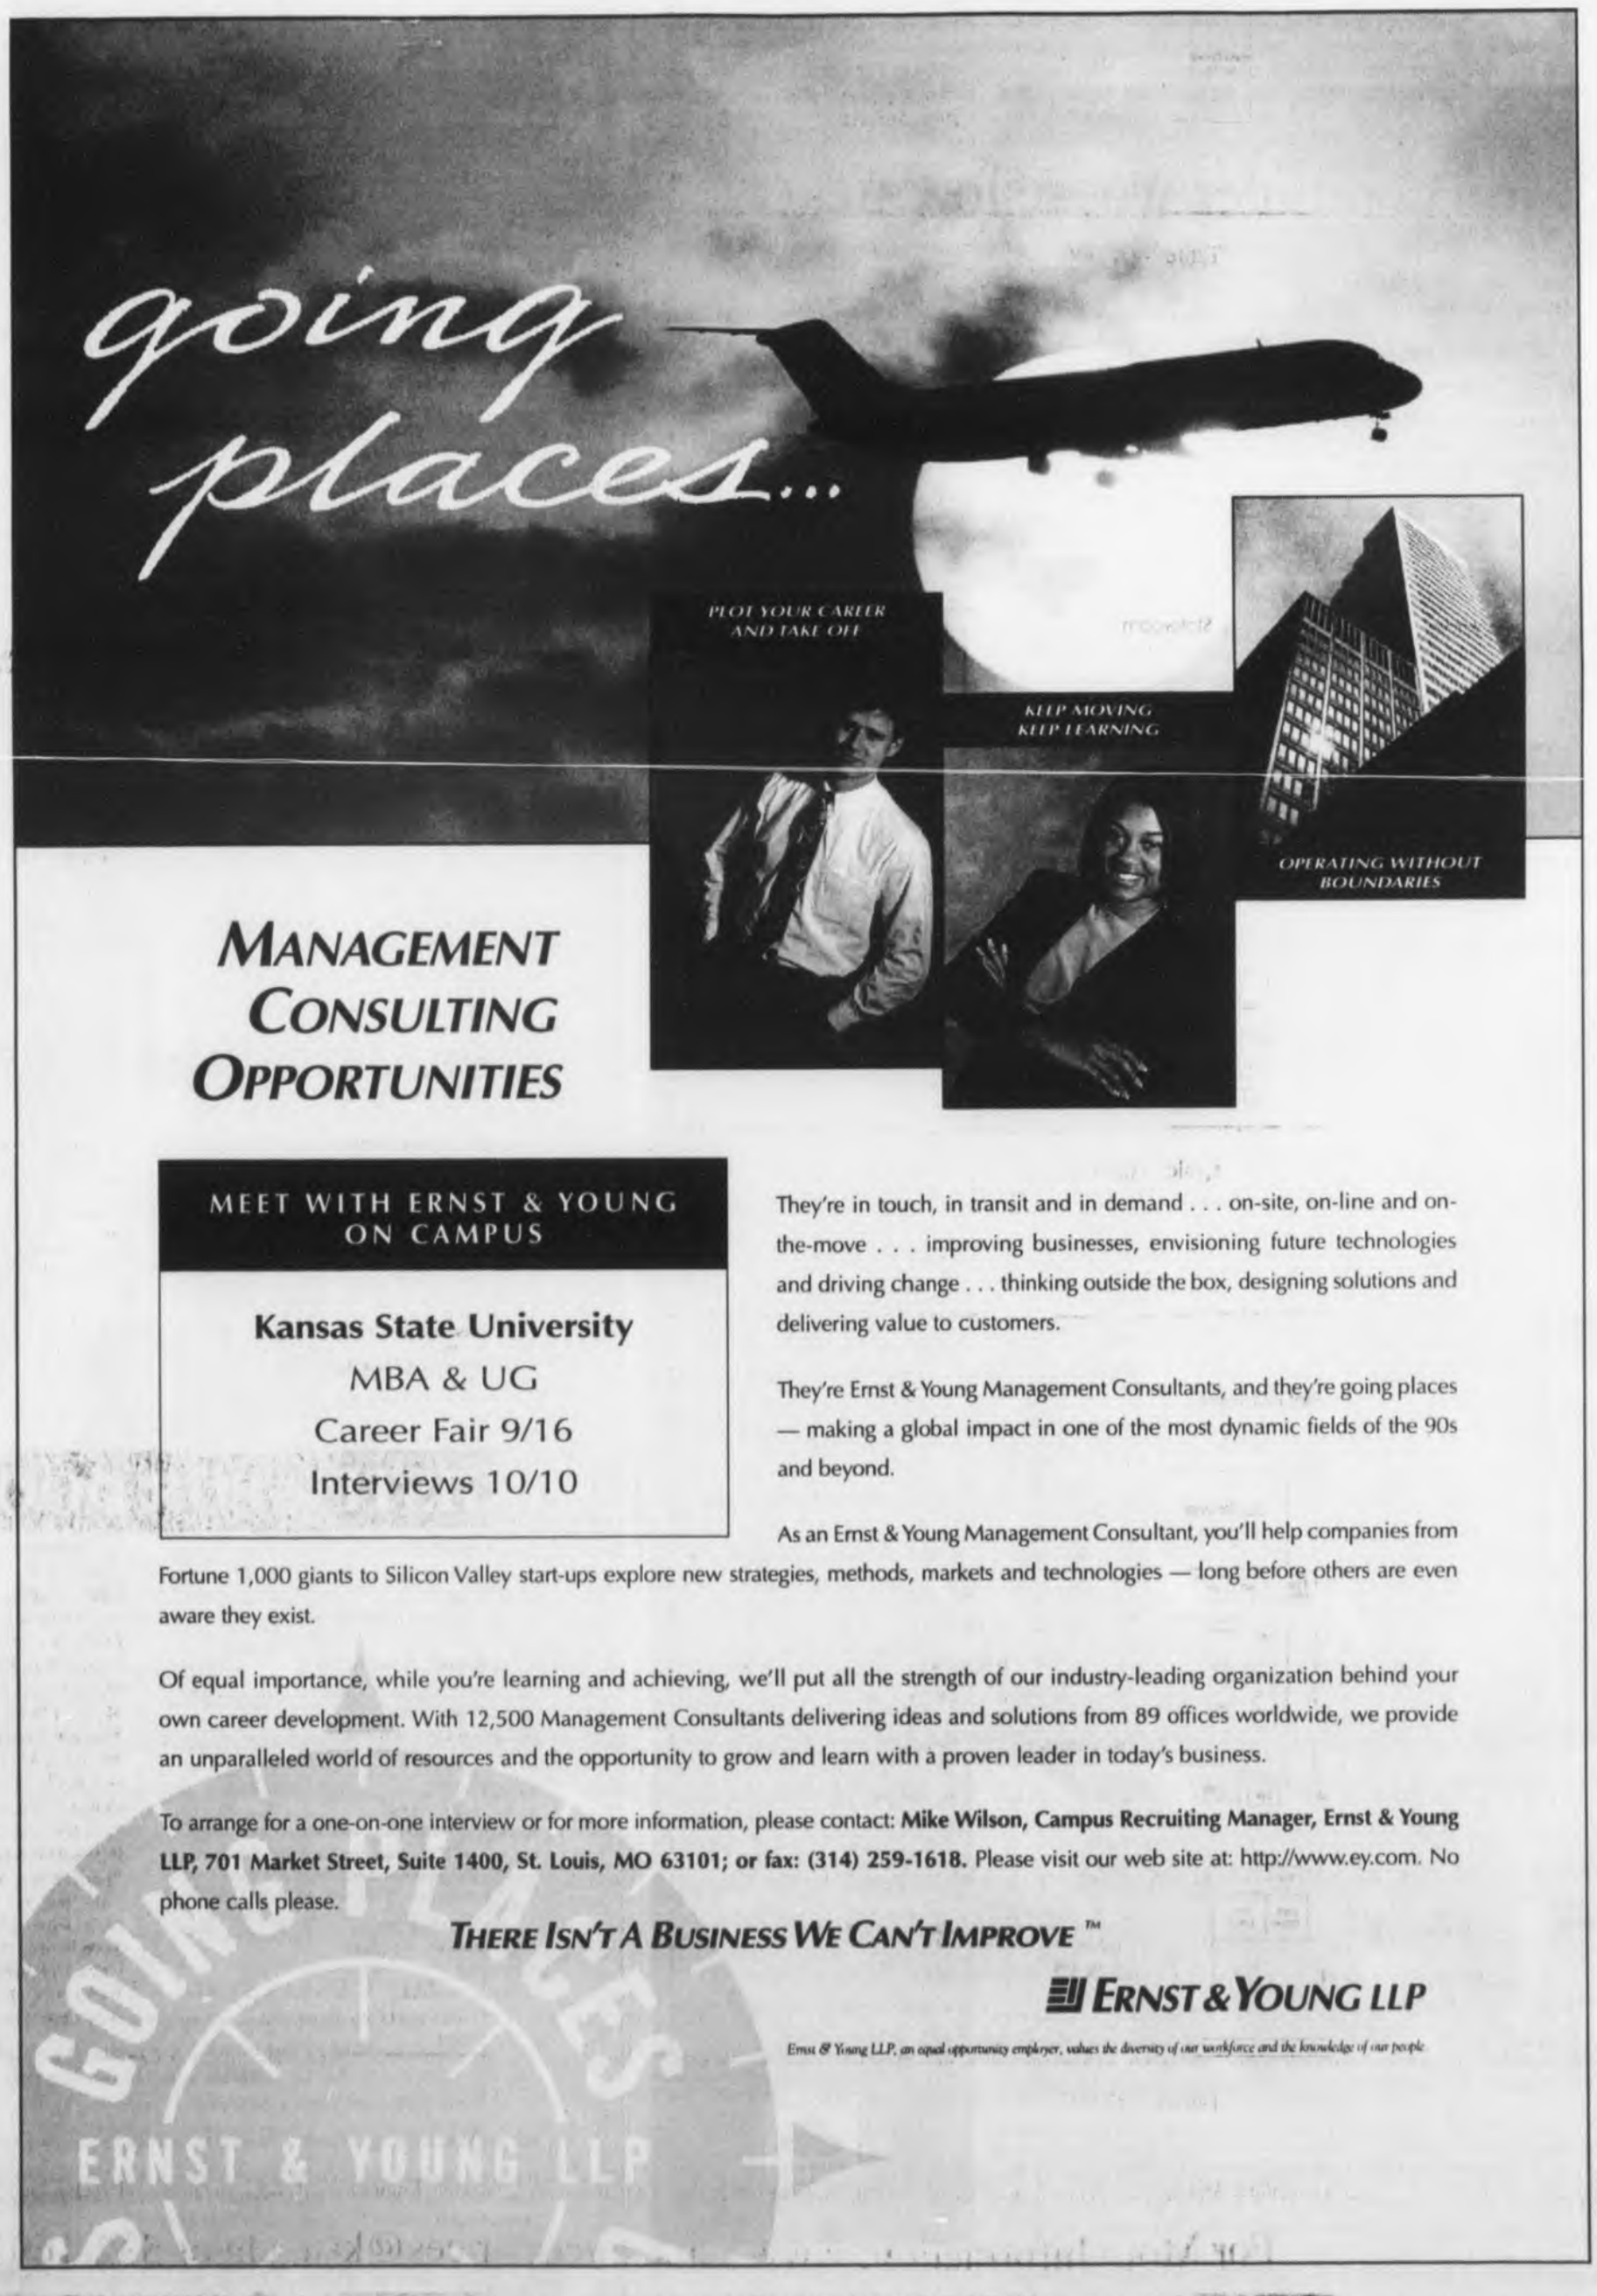
There are seven steps outlined by the group: Participate in your community, leave your car at home, buy locally, learn and respect local ecology, green the neighborhood, be frugal and happy and celebrate community.

One goal is to research and publish indicators that measure Manhattan's progress toward sustainability. Indicators can be just about anything, Paronto said.

An indicator of economic health is the diversity of businesses in the area, Paronto said. If one industry were to fail, others could still support the economy.

Manhattan Mayor Bruce Snead, residential energy specialist, is one of the 20 advisers to Sustainable Manhattan. Snead said although other communities have similar programs, Sustainable Manhattan does not belong to a national organization.

"Numerous other communities have similar activities and ideas, but Sustainable Manhattan is unique to this community," Snead said.



He said the advisers come from a variety of interests but all have common goals and ideas about the future of sustainability.

There is no funding for the project, but the group has applied for national grants, Snead said. Members now support the group with personal donations.

Paronto said one factor in obtaining sustainability is to increase awareness. The group is in the process of trying to get the Manhattan City Commission to adopt the sustainability concept as well as encourage action among community-based organizations, Paronto said.

The group's first public display will be at the Rollin' Down the River Festival Sept. 20-21 at the 1st Territorial Building. Snead said they will be handing out brochures and discussing sustainability with members of the community.

Anyone interested in Sustainable Manhattan is encouraged to e-mail Snead at bsnead@oz.oznet.ksu.edu or Paronto at paronto@ksu.edu. Information is also available at Edwards 8D.

Nonscholarship player arrested by FBI

SUN DEE MILLS

Redshirt freshman defensive lineman Robert J. Riggs was arrested by FBI agents Friday morning at a home in Manhattan.

"Bobby Riggs was in our program one year ago and left the team after he was diagnosed with a kidney problem," Coach Bill Snyder said. "He lost one of his kidneys but pleaded with us for an opportunity to return.

"He was so anxious to play that after receiving medical clearance, he provided a signed document to us waiving the university of any liability should anything happen while playing football," Snyder said.

Riggs, a member of the military police force at Fort Riley at the time of the incident, was charged with an indictment by the Federal Grand Jury of Topeka on four counts, said FBI Special Agent Jeff Lanza.

The four counts are aiding and abetting the armed robbery of a federal facility, conspiracy to commit armed robbery, solicitation to commit robbery and conspiracy to steal government property.

Lanza said the four counts relate to an incident that took place on March 15 at the Army and Air Force Exchange Service at Fort Riley.

On that date, a courier and a military escort were robbed of more than $36,000. The military escort was hit over the head with a shotgun, while the courier was sprayed with mace and threatened to be shot.

The indictment does not allege that Riggs was present at the robbery. However, the indictment did allege that he assisted with the planning of the robbery by purchasing the mace used on the courier, Lanza said.

Snyder said upon Riggs' return this summer, he volunteered to the coaching staff that he had appeared at a hearing in regards to this incident at Fort Riley.

Riggs told Snyder that he professed his innocence at the hearing, and the FBI did not give Riggs any reason to believe it would be taken further.

Based on the good faith information that Riggs was not involved, Snyder allowed Riggs to return to the team once school resumed.

"Since then, Bobby was a solid part of our football program," Snyder said. "He has done everything we've asked him to and has been a conscientious student.

"We will be better able to assess the situation once more information becomes available," Snyder said.

McCain computer woes slow tickets

MATT KREPS
staff writer

If you are waiting for tickets to events at McCain Auditorium, there is good news. The tickets have finally arrived. Patrons are being notified as orders are completed.

This year, tickets to McCain's performance series had to be preprinted as they were 10 years ago. This, along with the UPS strike, made the tickets late in arriving.

For the past 10 years, McCain used the same computerized ticketing system that Bramlage Coliseum used for sporting events. Bramlage purchased a new system this year, and McCain is not included on it.

"That was a decision made by them, not us," Dave Frain, assistant director of McCain said.

Currently, there are no plans to put McCain back on the athletic ticket system.

"We're going on the assumption that we'll have to get our own and find the funding for that," Frain said.

Until funds are available for the new system, McCain will use the preprinted tickets instead of printing them at the time an order is placed.

The staff is working to make the process as convenient as possible for patrons, Frain said. This includes ticket sale at the K-State Union Bookstore and Manhattan Town Center. Ticket sales hours have also been extended to noon to 6 p.m. to make purchasing more convenient.

Charlie Thomas, Bramlage director, said the new system is not suited from McCain's needs.

There are smaller systems for arts ticketing, Thomas said. They would be more appropriate to McCain's needs.

"Their needs are very specific," he said.

The Paciolan system that Bramlage uses is primarily an athletic ticketing system common to many other universities across the nation, Thomas said.

"Right now we're trying to straighten out the bugs in what we have," Thomas said. "We're going through the growing pains."

The new system includes several features that make the business of ticketing more convenient for Bramlage. It can track tickets, fund raising and business office work. These features were not as convenient in the old system, Thomas said.

The new system also integrates the three functions into one program, which will make it easier to handle.

Architect combines beauty, function in designs

Look it up on the web.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Living in Kansas, the land of cheap metal industrial sheds as a cure-all answer to manufacturing, one begins to wonder if architecture can capture elegance in industrial design.

Minnesota architect Julie VandenBerg Snow, who delivered the 12th-annual Lee A. Bryant Memorial Lecture on Friday in Forum Hall, has fused a European design ethic with American industry.

Her lecture, which focused on several of her firm's projects, illustrated her interest in connecting architecture to the landscape creating what she calls a "transparency" and the process of assembly with modern construction elements.

"The lucidity with which the work presents itself is a measure of success of our work," Snow said.

Perhaps most elegant was an industrial facility designed for a River Falls, Wis., site of 11 acres. Snow's buildings open themselves to the outside through vast expanses of glass that float the light, long-span truss roofs.

In one slide, a large piece of equipment sits near a floor-to-ceiling window with a view to a green lawn and distant forest.

"We wanted to connect man, machine and nature in a very direct way," Snow said. "There is a human need for light and air and connection with nature outside the workplace."

An attention to structural elements is evident in nearly every project Snow presented. The relative simplicity of the structures belies the thoughtful consideration that reveals the easy refinement of the projects.

Snow's work makes its interior's function and use evident to the outside, especially in her Minneapolis Fifth Precinct police department. The interior functions, such as a community room and the police office, are made transparent to the street to reinforce the safe environment of the neighborhood.

To finish her lecture, Snow compared the worlds of art and architecture, which keeps in line with the spirit of the Bryant lectur.

"We wanted to be careful not to present our work as art, but as architecture," Snow said.

Snow compared and dismissed the two extremes of architecture: the stripped-down practicality of almost pure engineering to the architect as visionary artist.

"The voice of the architect is always subservient to the architecture," Snow said. "Our voice will never rise over the needs of the architecture."

Snow's architectural philosophy is grounded in the real. And yet her work never sacrifices a subtle formal beauty rarely found in modern industrial design.

"For us, the flaw is not the translation into the real, but not beginning in the real in the first place," Snow said.

Snow serves as an adjunct associate professor at the University of Minnesota and is a member of the Minnesota Architecture Foundation. Her work has been published in Architecture, Architectural Record and Progressive Architecture.

Following her lecture, Snow presented the American Institute of Architects Kansas Honor Awards at the Ramada Inn. She served as chairwoman of the awards jury.

Farrell Library building wins award for attention to detail

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Farrell Library has yet to be dedicated as Hale Library, but it has already claimed a state design award.

At its annual honor awards ceremony, the American Institute of Architects Kansas honored the library design with an Excellence in Design award Friday night at the Ramada Inn. It was the final event of AIA Kansas' annual conference held at K-State this year.

Farrell Library was designed by Brent Bowman and Associates of Manhattan and Hammond Beeby Babka Inc. Associate Architects.

Minnesota architect Julie VandenBerg Snow, chairwoman of the 1997 awards jury, presented the award along with AIA Kansas president Vince Mancini.

In honoring the Farrell design, Snow said the building's attention to "whimsical little detail" impressed the jury, especially the metal work on the south-facing entrance and first/second floor open stair.

"We found that the project was very believable," Snow said. "You really had a sense of mass and weight of the stone walls even in the new addition."

Among those attending to accept on behalf of K-State were Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and university architect, Karen Cole, associate dean of libraries and Karen McCulloh, assistant to the dean of libraries.

Carter said to win the award was reassuring.

"It's always pleasant to have your colleagues in the practice of architecture recognize the work that the state of Kansas is producing for the people of the state," he said. "I've had the philosophy ever since I entered the practice that the state can afford good design."

Carter said he anticipates the library will go on to win more design awards.

Farrell Library will be dedicated as Hale Library on Oct. 5.

Another Excellence in Design award winners was a modular housing project in Wichita by Charles McAfee Architects.

Accepting the award was McAfee's daughter, Charyl McAfee-Duncan, AIA. McAfee-Duncan said people need to get past the idea of all modular housing being of low quality.

"My father developed this concept more than 30 years ago, but back then people were greedy," she said. "He didn't want to bring the project out until there was a need for housing."

The project has won acclaim for providing jobs for unemployed people in the black community of Wichita and providing low-cost housing solutions for people in need.

Snow said the project was awarded because "it did so much with so little."

Gould Evans Goodman of Kansas City, Mo. won an Excellence in Design award for its Congregation Beth Torah in Overland Park, Ks.

Three student awards were also given to projects by University of Kansas students.

TERRI A. COMBS, left, 1977 graduate with degrees in physical science and biology; Dedria Dane, 1979 graduate in fashion design; Tami Farr-Smith, 1981 graduate in early childhood education; Linda Carter, 1981 graduate in theater; and Dwan Gardner, senior in life sciences, compete in the K-State black alumni and greek reunion step show Saturday night at the Ramada Inn. The five were members in Delta Sigma Theta, Eta Gamma chapter, when attending K-State.

BB gun shootout to trigger worldwide competition

KRISTEN BOYD
staff reporter

Watch out! Hundreds of guns will be fired in Manhattan next summer. There will be no need to panic, however, because the shots will be from controlled BB guns.

Manhattan will be host to the 1998 International BB Gun Championship next summer, July 15-19. The United States Junior Chamber of Commerce Executive Committee chose to have the event in Manhattan for the first time.

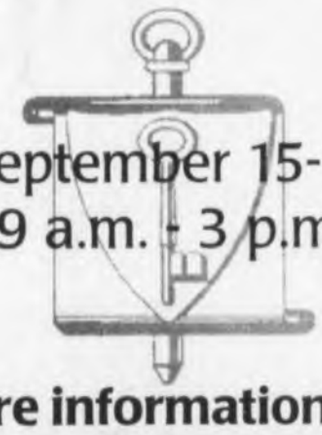
People will be coming to Manhattan from all over the world to participate in the tournament.

There will be 48 teams from Ireland, Canada, Germany and the United States. Each team will consist of five to 10 people, ages 8 to 15.

"We look forward to hosting these international guests in the Little Apple," Becky Blake, director of the Manhattan Convention and Visitors Bureau, said.

Most team members will bring their families and coaches with them. This means there will be nearly 1,000 people attending the event.

"This is the first time we've ever bid for something this large. This event will bring about $150,000 to the community just by the eating and shopping the participants will do. It will raise money for the Jaycees and will bring economic development to the community," Tonya Blattner of the Manhattan Jaycees, said.



The Manhattan Jaycees and the Manhattan Convention and Visitors Bureau were the organizations who worked to get Manhattan noticed.

"We heard the tournament was up for bid and we wanted it. Our intent is to be able to make a permanent home for the Jaycees, a place we can call home," Blattner said.

The chapters sent gift baskets to the committee to remind them of Manhattan's assets. The local chapters also sent postcards and set up booths to promote Manhattan.

The Manhattan Chamber of Commerce will set up group tours to show the international guests around the city. Donna Logback, tourism sales manager for the Chamber, will give the tours.

The public will be welcome to attend the event.

Prayers offered at Mother Teresa's graveside

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CALCUTTA, India — Sisters of Mother Teresa's order sang and prayed over her simple tomb Sunday, a quiet tribute to an unassuming woman the day after the world said goodbye with an elaborate state funeral.

About 100 nuns of the Missionaries of Charity, wearing their trademark blue-trimmed saris, gathered around the flower-covered grave, in a former dining hall of the convent where Mother Teresa lived.

Photographers' flash bulbs briefly illuminated the dim room as dignitaries, including Bernadette Chirac, wife of French President Jacques Chirac, and several reporters were allowed to briefly enter the room where the Nobel laureate is interred.

Mother Teresa, known as the saint of the gutters, was buried in a private ceremony Saturday after her funeral.

Her tomb, a cement-covered rectangular block about 3 feet high, has a biblical verse etched on a white marble marker: "Love one another as I have loved you."

Visitors were asked to remove their shoes before entering as a sign of respect to Mother Teresa, who died of a heart attack on Sept. 5 at the age of 87.

Saturday, thousands had lined the streets to watch Mother Teresa, her body in an open white casket resting on a gun carriage, make her final journey through the city where the Roman Catholic nun began her worldwide mission to the poor.

India, the adopted country of the European-born nun, awarded her the high honor of a state funeral complete with military escort for her cortege and 21-gun salute at her burial.

"God loved the world so much that he sent to us Jesus Christ. And Jesus loved us so much that he sent to us Mother Teresa," said Sister Nirmala, who took over as head of the Missionaries of Charity after Mother Teresa retired a few months before her death.

Onlookers responded to her eulogy with loud, prolonged applause. Sister Nirmala and the 4,000 other nuns of the Missionaries of Charity will need such support to continue raising orphan children in Calcutta, feeding hungry street people in Rome and caring for babies with AIDS in Washington.

Mother Teresa has founded hundreds of clinics, schools, orphanages, homeless shelters and other projects around the world since she said she received a call from God to serve the poorest of the poor in 1946.

Some, even in the order, have expressed concerns it will be difficult to raise funds without Mother Teresa's charismatic leadership.

A Christian in an overwhelmingly Hindu nation, Mother Teresa unswervingly focused on the poorest and built a worldwide network of charities. Her work freely crossed religious boundaries, caught the attention and admiration of world leaders and won the 1979 Nobel Peace Prize.

New Directions support program provides various services for displaced homemakers

More info?
The phone number for New Directions is (785) 532-6561.

ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI
staff reporter

Losing a partner because of divorce or death is difficult and stressful. The situation is usually compounded with the loss of a primary or sole source of income.

The New Directions support program provides men and women the assistance and support needed to cope.

The program offers not only financial support, but also informational resources, referrals and counseling. The program is focused toward teen-age mothers, single parents, displaced homemakers and those who have a partner who is disabled.

Cynthia Shanley, executive director and the only full-time employee of New Directions, said often a person can find themselves back in the job market after 10 or even 20 years of working at home.

Losing their primary or sole source of income also sends displaced homemakers looking for a new way to support their families and not knowing where to begin.

"We help them develop a new direction," Shanley said. "We help them to clarify goals and take positive steps."

The program helps by giving interest assessments to determine what a person needs and what they would like to pursue.

They also help by providing finances to attend vocational training, buy text books and provide child care.

"We help map out a satisfying career that will financially satisfy and support them and make them happy," Shanley said.

Beyond educational assistance, the program can help with resume writing and interviewing skills. New Directions can also help people build their self-confidence, learn to budget their time and money, and improve social skills.

New Directions helped Regina Wilson, a Manhattan resident, work toward becoming a certified nurses' aid and then a home health aid.

"I wanted to take some classes at the technical college and no one else in town could help me out with the finances," Wilson said.

After learning about New Directions last January at a women's survival class, she used the references and support offered by the program to pursue her goals.

"Because of their help, I'm now working at St. Joseph Senior Community," Wilson said.

Wilson is just one of the 100 to 200 people helped per year by the program. New Directions serves seven counties in the surrounding area and focuses on women 16 to 55 years old. They serve about 10 people per week and the numbers are increasing.

"We find men in this same position too," Shanley said. "We just treat each individual as such, an individual."

All services offered by New Directions are free and are available to anyone who needs assistance, Shanley said.

Wildcat Walk changes headquarters

Need more info?
People who want to volunteer for Wildcat Walk can apply by e-mail. The address is wildcatwalk@ksu.edu. People wanting an escort from Wildcat Walk can call 395-SAFE.

LANDON TRAWNY
staff reporter

K-State's Wildcat Walk escort service has come a long way. To be exact, it has moved halfway across campus.

The program started as a service operated out of Haymaker Hall and provided escorts only to the residence halls. This year Wildcat Walk has changed its headquarters to Farrell Library.

"The service is free, and now it's open to all students, visitors, faculty and staff," said Travis Johnson, sophomore in computer science and Wildcat Walk coordinator.

Johnson said Wildcat Walk operates up to a six-block radius off campus.

Aaron Otto, senior in political science and general management, said he strongly supported the change.

"In the past, there have been cases of attack in poorly-lit areas," Otto said. "Expanding the program to serve everyone helps ensure campus safety."

Johnson said he believes the new location is responsible for increased publicity and use of Wildcat Walk.

"Use has increased over 100 percent from last year to more than 20 students per week, partly because many of the people are already in Farrell and want someone to walk them home or to their car," Johnson said.

"Some students never knew about the program until they saw it in the library."

Johnson said he hopes the increased budget for advertising will raise the number of people served to 50 people each week.

This year the budget for Wildcat Walk has increased dramatically. A total of $30,000 was allocated to the program. Two-thirds of the budget will go toward the salary of two pairs of student security.

The two pairs work in two 8-hour shifts, one from 6 p.m. to 2 a.m. and the other from 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. They are available seven days a week.

Wildcat Walk is also operated by volunteers who work in two-hour shifts. Paul Franciskato, junior in family studies and human services, has been a volunteer for the past two years.

"I thought it would be a good experience working with people and providing a useful service for campus," Franciskato said.

There are currently 20 volunteers and 11 more in training. Training consists of a background check, interview and a short training session done by the K-State Police.

Johnson said he would like to have at least 40 volunteers, but would welcome more.

Johnson said volunteers can get a lot of studying done or just relax while waiting for calls.

"The people you meet are a nice benefit, too," Franciskato said.

Farrell, Throckmorton, Durland to begin changing names

Check it out on the Collegian.

JAMI NELSON
staff writer

Throckmorton and Durland Halls and Farrell Library have been renovated and include additions in the process of being renamed.

Some buildings' namesakes are significant financial contributors, others are individuals who have offered outstanding service to the university, said Gerald Carter, director of facilities planning.

The renaming process begins when a department, dean or the KSU Foundation makes a recommendation to President Jon Wefald, who then submits the proposal to the Kansas Board of Regents for final approval.

One building going through a name change is Farrell Library. Its name will change to Hale Library in a ceremony on Oct. 5.

"So little of Farrell Library was left exposed that the administration made the decision to consider renaming the facility," Carter said.

Carter said the renaming was discussed with descendants of the Farrell and Hale families prior to the decision.

"A multimillion-dollar gift from the Joe and Joyce Hale family not only provided a substantial contribution to the project but helped us convince K-State students, the governor and the Kansas legislature to fund the remainder of the $30-million project," said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

"We have been using the name Hale Library," said Jan Crow, Hale Library marketing and public relations director. "We will officially be using it in October."

Following the library's Oct. 5th dedication ceremony, the limestone name signs will be in place soon.

Another building undergoing a change in name is Throckmorton Hall.

"The building is still commonly referred to as Throckmorton Hall," said Gerry Posler, head professor of the agronomy department. "Legally, it's the Throckmorton Plant Sciences Center."

This building complex includes the original Throckmorton Hall, east and west additions, the greenhouses and the old dairy barn.

The original hall was completed in 1981, but the east and west additions were not added until 1994, Posler said.

The west addition is officially named Merrill Hall and houses the agronomy department. Fred and Virginia Merrill donated $1 million to the renovation project in honor of Fred's father, E.F. Merrill, and so became the addition's namesake.

The east addition contains the horticulture and forestry departments. It has no namesake as of yet because there has been no significant donor after which to name it, Posler said. So it is simply part of Throckmorton.

The plant pathology department is on the top floor of the entire building, which includes the east and west additions.

Durland has plans to rename part of its building, too, after a three-phase renovation.

In 1976, the original Durland was completed in phase one. Today, it houses the chemical and industrial engineering departments and will keep its original name.

The second phase was completed in 1983. This will be officially renamed and dedicated on Oct. 24 to honor Don Rathbone, a former dean of engineering who, in June 1997, ended 24 years in the K-State engineering department.

"I feel very honored," Rathbone said. "No doubt about it."

"I don't think anyone would deny that Don Rathbone has made a significant contribution to the engineering department," Carter said.

Rathbone Hall will include the dean's offices, classrooms, the electrical and mechanical engineering departments and the Paslay Lecture Hall.

The final phase of the project will be known as Fiedler Hall, in honor of George and Alice Fiedler. They donated $6 million to the renovation, Terry King, dean of engineering, said.

"We haven't finalized the design," Rathbone said of the Fiedler addition.

There are plans to include a library, multimedia lecture hall, computer classrooms and the civil engineering department in this third-phase addition.

Rathbone said the final result of the Durland renovation would be positive.

"We think it's going to be one of the finest facilities on campus," he said.

Carter said such renovations have been made possible by more donors supporting the university in recent years.

ocean doesn't protect us anymore."

Cohen closed the lecture with a quote from Winston Churchill.

"Churchill said, 'America, America. A great and strong country, but one that's willing like a workhorse to pull the rest of the world up out of despair ... but will it stay the course?' We have stayed the course. That is our legacy. And we will stay the course. That is our destiny," Cohen said.

During a post-lecture interview, Cohen said his Friday visit to Fort Riley was a good one, and that there are currently no military downsizing plans that include drastic changes at the Fort.

"There are no plans. I would say that Fort Riley is in very good condition, but no one can predict the future. The community spirit that you have supporting Fort Riley presents a positive picture to any future base changes," he said.

The colleges participating are agriculture, architecture, arts and sciences, business administration, education, engineering, human ecology, and technology and aviation.

The website also offers an extensive calendar of workshops where students can improve their skills in resume building, résumé critique, interviewing and job search strategy.

A link titled "Tips for Working a Career Fair" appears frequently throughout the site, the theme of which is meticulous preparation.

"What we really recommend is that people plan ahead," Schuley said. "President Wefald called me, and he wanted me to emphasize the importance of not just a handshake, but a firm handshake. He said it got him through school, and that it's got him through life since then."

Students are not required to preregister for the Career Fair, but they are urged to prioritize a list of employers whom they want to visit.

The Collegian will print a full-page floor plan of the Career Fair, including names and locations of all participants, on Sept. 11, 15 and 16.

"If enrollment for some reason declines, a portion of the Campus Fee Adjustment account will be put in the reserve account to make sure the minimum limit can be maintained throughout the enrollment decrease," Otto said.

The Campus Fee Reserve account has a different purpose. Otto said the reserve account is for emergencies. If a department did not have enough money in its budget to pay for a significant equipment failure, the reserve account pay for it, Otto said.

"If Lafene were to lose an X-ray machine or the Student Publications lose their press, we would have a huge crisis. That is what this money is for," Otto said.

Kim Peschka, committee member and sophomore in political science, said she thinks the accounts are a good idea.

"You never know what could happen," Peschka said. "Something could break down, like an X-ray machine, and we would not have any money to take care of it."

John Yeakel, senior in animal science, said he likes the plan.

"I think it will be great for the future students," Yeakel said. "It will be nice to have extra money if something terrible were to happen.

Bishop was quickly flushed from the pocket and he scrambled right. After making it over to the sideline, he narrowly avoided being sacked by two Bobcats and headed back to the left, deep behind the line of scrimmage.

After avoiding another sack, he released the ball as he was hit, sending the ball about 50 yards downfield, where two junior wide receivers teamed up to help K-State overcome needing more than half the length of the field for a first down.

> "We didn't do what we had to do," Beasley said. "(Snyder) was just looking for someone who would go in there and compete, but Mike and I, we didn't compete tonight. That will never happen again.
> K-State backup QB

Everett Burnett tipped the pass, and Gavin Peries made the catch as he fell at the Ohio 3-yard line, giving the Cats first-and-goal. Despite the 39-yard gain, K-State coach Bill Snyder wasn't pleased.

"To me, that's not a play. You can't survive making plays like that," he said. "You don't get very many plays like that in the Big 12 Conference. You've got to make things happen with execution. That was a result of faulty and poor execution."

On the next play after the pass, Hickson ran the ball in from three yards out, giving K-State its only offensive touchdown of the night — a touchdown that wouldn't have happened without the botched play that resulted in a 39-yard gain.

Snyder tried to jump-start the offense in the second quarter by bringing Jonathan Beasley in to replace Bishop, but Beasley had problems with the Ohio defense also.

Beasley left in the fourth quarter after completing one of three passes for nine yards, being sacked twice and rushing seven times for 10 yards.

Bishop came back in, but he wasn't very effective either, completing three of 14 passes for 93 yards and losing 18 yards on 12 rushes.

"We didn't do what we had to do," Beasley said. "(Snyder) was just looking for someone who would go in there and compete, but Mike and I, we didn't compete tonight. That will never happen again."

Aside from their breaks while they had the ball, the Cats got two breaks on defense.

In the second half, K-State couldn't manage to score, and barely held on for the victory. After the break, the Bobcats scored 20 unanswered points and outgained the Cats 308-56.

On Ohio's first drive of the second half, the Bobcats faced a fourth-and-goal situation from the K-State 3-yard-line. The Bobcats decided to go for the touchdown instead of kicking a 20-yard field goal, and quarterback Kareem Wilson was stopped at the two.

Later, the Bobcats were driving in the fourth quarter and reached the K-State 23-yard line. Junior linebacker Travis Ochs intercepted a pass from Wilson, a pass that could have gone for a touchdown if it was completed.

The interception was K-State's sixth big break of the game and kept the score at 23-13. Ohio added a late touchdown, but failed on an on-sides kick attempt. K-State recovered, ran out the clock and took the narrow victory.

The Cats have this weekend off, but will play again in two weeks at home against Bowling Green.

"I think (the bye week) is coming at a good time. I think there's a lot of things we need to work out," Ochs said. "I think there's a lot of guys who need to step up. I think we need it."

already taken his.

Now that Beasley has played in a game, he has forfeited the option of redshirting. Beasley backed up senior Brian Kavanagh last season instead of taking the traditional redshirt year as a true freshman.

Just two weeks ago, Snyder said that he would never again play Beasley in the role that he held in his freshman season. So that leaves Snyder with Bishop, who has two seasons of eligibility, Beasley, who has three and Helm, who also has three seasons. None of the three may be redshirted this season.

For their part, both Beasley and Bishop are taking their newly undetermined roles in stride.

"I just have to stay focused and be the leader that I can be," Bishop said. "There were a couple of times I didn't get the job done, and there were a couple of times Beasley didn't get the job done. It's up to Coach Snyder on who he wants go with."

With the knowledge that Bishop probably will start Sept. 27 against Bowling Green, Beasley said, "That's up to Coach Snyder."

There is one person who's decided who should hold the Wildcat starting quarterback job. He coaches for Ohio.

"Bishop hasn't been here for long. He just started here in August, but I'm pretty impressed with his athletic ability," Bobcat Coach Jim Grobe said. "I'm sure as he goes on, he's going to get better and better and better."

Students and faculty gathered Monday evening in All Faiths Chapel to honor the memory of K-State student Mike Newcomb.

Newcomb, a senior in pre-medicine, died last Tuesday from injuries sustained after his motorcycle was hit by a car. Services took place last weekend in Hays, Kan. Monday's memorial was a chance for friends on campus to remember Newcomb.

Newcomb's three roommates, who have known each other since his freshman year, opened the ceremony with prayers and remembrances. They stood near a small table adorned with pictures selected by friends and family.

"He was truly a great human being. He's had a tremendous impact on all of our lives," said Matt Meyer, roommate and senior in animal science.

The 35 people who attended the service were invited to speak about their memories of Newcomb.

"I regret deeply that Mike's life was cut short so abruptly. I believe all of us who knew Mike are better people for having associated with him, and I hope that we will all be sustained by happy memories," said Susan Gormely, Newcomb's health professions adviser.

Mark Newcomb, Mike's 13-year-old brother, played a piano selection he had composed in memory of his older brother. It was simply titled "Michael."

Newcomb's effect on his friends and family was especially felt throughout the ceremony. One woman, a laboratory assistant he worked with, was moved to tears as she remembered him baking banana bread for her family and reading to her small children.

"There's a lot about life that's incomprehensible. This is one of MIDDLE RIVER, Md. — Citing national security, military police kept nine families from returning to their homes Monday, seized photographers' film and cordoned off the site of a stealth fighter crash as they searched for pieces of an aircraft whose very existence was once a state secret.

The clampdown in this quiet waterfront neighborhood began almost immediately after the F-117A jet went down during an air show performance Sunday, crashing into a house and causing six minor injuries on the ground.

"There was military everywhere. This road was full, the sky was loaded. I tell you it was something," said Paul Canatella, standing in his driveway less than a 100 yards from the jet's mangled canopy, which was watched by two armed military guards.

"I've never seen anything like it," Canatella said. "You name it they were here."

Three blocks of the Baltimore suburb were quickly evacuated and military troops moved in to scour the area for pieces of the $45 million, black, bat-winged plane.

"It is a secret aircraft. Obviously we want to protect it the best way we can," said Capt. Drew Sullins, a Maryland National Guard spokesman.

Film was confiscated from members of the media, including Associated Press photojournalist Roberto Borea, who had chartered a boat to take him to the neighborhood.

"As soon as we stepped on shore, the military was there and that was it," Borea said. "Had I chosen not to surrender my equipment, I would have been taken into custody."

Sullins said Monday the film and equipment would be returned and the seizure should never have taken place. He also allowed pool photographers on the scene for a few minutes under tight military supervision.

The boomerang-shaped F-117A Nighthawk uses special design and materials to avoid enemy radar. During much of the 1980s, it was so secret the military didn't acknowledge its existence.

It was used in the Gulf War against heavily defended Iraqi targets because of its strange shape, tight construction and special surface paint, to evade radar and radar-guided missiles.

Amateur video of Sunday's crash showed a piece of the aircraft, apparently from the tail or a wing, flying off before the wedge-shaped jet went down in a slow spin as the pilot ejected safely.

Retired bomber pilot Norman Mack said he called the military to come retrieve the first two pieces he saw fall off the plane. They landed in shallow water behind his house. Mack said several boats showed up and officials called his daughter later asking permission to retrieve a smaller piece of debris from her boat.

Emma Wetzelberger, a clerk at Wilson Point Liquors near the airport, said dozens of diners at the restaurant she was in Sunday night couldn't return in the boats they had used to get there because the military had closed down the Middle River.

"They were angry. Boaters couldn't get back because they had cordoned off the river looking for parts," she said. "I hope they don't have the air show any more. I'm tired of them buzzing my house."

At Bruno's restaurant near the crash scene, they took the crash in stride, quickly inventing a drink called the "Stealth Bomber Shooter."

"It'll knock you out of the sky," said bartender Vicki Thoms.

CAREER FAIR OFFERS IMPORTANT CHANCE, EXPERIENCE FOR STUDENTS

STORY BY JENNI EVANS

For many students, beginning a job search can be a confusing and time-consuming activity. The Career Fair is a starting point for any student looking for employment.

"It's the starting gate for the career or job search at K-State, regardless of whether the person is a freshman or a graduate student, whether they're looking for internships, permanent employment or career information," said Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services and chairman of the Career Fair Committee.

For students who are planning to attend the Career Fair today, there are several ways to prepare and stay organized.

Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, recommends students begin by looking at the CES World Wide Web page to determine which companies they would like to speak to. The Web page offers links to company Web pages where students can find information.

The CES library also offers folders and portfolios of participating companies to aid in research.

"It's going to be a much more effective and beneficial experience for them if they come into our office or onto our Web page and research the companies. They're going to be much more knowledgeable. They can ask questions about the company or refer to some of the facts about the company," Henderson said.

Henderson said students should plan on arriving at the Career Fair early.

"The first hour and a half are the slowest," he said. Students should have a greater opportunity to speak with more companies if they arrive between 9 and 10:30 a.m.

As they arrive, students will check in at the student registration table and receive a map and a list of companies interviewing for jobs in their college. This list can also be obtained from the CES Web page.

Henderson said students should look at lists from other colleges as well.

"A lot of people have transferable skills and might be able to market themselves to these companies, even

Enviroleague receives grant to improve Pillsbury Crossing

The people of Enviroleague, an organization that works with the youth of the community to foster and implement the improvement of the environment, didn't have to think twice about what to do with $9,000.

After receiving a $9,115 grant from the Wal-Mart Foundation, the Enviroleague unanimously decided to put the money toward renovating Pillsbury Crossing.

"We adopted the Pillsbury Crossing so that it would be family-used, not abused," said Patty Seabourn, Enviroleague coordinator.

Enviroleague began four years ago with the help of Seabourn and her husband in an effort to help educate children about the importance of the environment. The organization has students involved from kindergarten to high school.

Sarah Blair, committee member, has helped recruit members since the beginning of the league.

"We are all environmentally conscious and felt it was time for children to give back to the community," she said.

Enviroleague gets all its funding through grants and couldn't have done work on Pillsbury Crossing without the grant from the Wal-Mart Foundation.

The Wal-Mart Foundation sets aside $1 million every fiscal year to put in an account specifically for environmental grants. Susan Rush, green coordinator for Wal-Mart, said grants start coming in early because the money usually runs out by the summer.

"They don't just take money for the big boys," Rush said. "They put that money towards grants and the Wal-Mart Foundation. They want to give that money back to the community."

The Enviroleague has used the money from the grant to put cedar on the trails, plant flowers, clean birdhouses and conduct a land and water cleanout.

This Saturday, the group will use some of the money to work with Bayer Construction to do limestone screening.

Enviroleague members will also build recycled picnic tables and park benches.

"We use individual help from the children and parents mostly, but some things we just can't do, so we use some money for professionals to come in and do the job right," Rush said.

Seabourn said that in the future, the league hopes to put a butterfly garden and animal track in the park. The animal track would be a sandbox where children can place food and wait for the animals to come and eat. They can then study the animal tracks left in the sand.

Enviroleague does not plan to stop working on Pillsbury Crossing after the money is gone. Seabourn said it has designated families to check on the park once a month to see what needs to be done.

"We hope that people will see what we have done and not trash it," Rush said. "Once you've volunteered, it becomes a part of you."

Enviroleague is looking for volunteers to assist with the renovation of Pillsbury Crossing.

Members will be at the park on Saturday to build picnic tables and park benches, and they need older volunteers.

Questionable marriages led to questioning couples

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Authorities are blaming a mess about marriages on a mail-order ministry.

An opinion from the Tennessee attorney general stated marriages performed by ministers of the Universal Life Church of Modesto, Calif,. aren't legal in Tennessee.

"You can't imagine how many people have called and said, 'I don't know if I'm married,'" spokeswoman Sharon Flair said. "There have been dozens and dozens of people."

The church's mail-order ministry allegedly allows anyone — without a background check — to receive a certificate to be a minister. Authorities say dogs, death-row inmates and the dead have been awarded certificates.

State Rep. Tim Burchett of Knoxville has asked for another opinion to clarify the legal position of anyone in Tennessee married by the ministers.

Secretary of state plans to form task force on Kansas elections

TOPEKA — Prompted by answers to an unscientific poll at the Kansas State Fair, Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh plans to form a task force to consider whether Kansas has too many elections.

On Monday, Thornburgh said a majority of people who stopped by the secretary of state office's booth at the fair thought there were too many elections. Thornburgh's office is compiling results of responses by passersby to five questions.

Congressional, legislative and county candidates face primary and general elections each even-numbered year. Regular elections for city offices are in the spring of odd-numbered years.

But local governments, such as cities, school districts and improvement districts, can schedule special elections throughout the year.

"Somewhere in Kansas, we have an election every month of every year, I would venture to say," Thornburgh said.

Thornburgh said he plans to appoint city, county and other local government officials to review proposals for cutting down on the number of elections. For example, he said, the state could have one designated election day each quarter, as Missouri does.

He said having so many elections might frustrate voters enough that they avoid special elections.

"We are always looking for ways to increase voter turnout," Thornburgh said, "and maybe fewer elections would accomplish that."

Seagram puts message encouraging responsible drinking in liquor ads

NEW YORK — Seagram, trying to gain wider acceptance by broadcasters for its liquor ads, plans to start its TV commercials by encouraging viewers to drink responsibly.

The Montreal-based beverage and entertainment company has been taking the lead since the distilled spirits industry ended its four-decade, self-imposed ban on advertising liquor on television and radio last year.

Dropping the ban drew criticism from President Clinton, government regulators and advocacy groups who warned that such advertising would encourage youngsters to drink.

Seagram has denied that was its intent and argued that it should be as free to use broadcast advertising as brewers and winemakers.

Some stations have refused to run its commercials even though they included a written message at the end of the commercial encouraging responsible drinking.

Now the company is making the message more prominent by moving it to the front of the TV commercials and having it read by a narrator, said Arthur Shapiro, head of marketing for the Seagram Americas division.

The statement says, "People of legal drinking age should enjoy alcohol responsibly, but don't drink if you're under 21."

The statement will also be included in Seagram's radio ads.

Shapiro said nearly 100 TV stations and 400 radio stations have run at least one of Seagram's liquor ads since mid-1996.

ABC, CBS, NBC and Fox have said they have no plans to change their policies against accepting liquor ads.

Corrections CLARIFICATIONS

In an article titled "BSU alumni offer advice" in Monday's edition of the Collegian, the headline and first paragraph need clarification. Black Student Union members participated in the discussion group between alumni and students on Saturday. However, the dialogue was sponsored by organizers of the Black Alumni and Greek Reunion.

A name was misspelled in a correction in Monday's Collegian. The correct spelling is Tamara Abdulhaqq.

In a story about leadership studies, leadership studies should have been listed as minor in leadership studies. The leadership studies minor is meant to supplement a student's academic major, not replace it.

The record reveals the diverse musical interest of each Protein member. Josh infuses songs with his wry sense of humor steeped in a buoyant reality which speaks of summer fairs, feathered hair, juvenile hall and heavy metal. The band takes Josh's lyrics and music and collectively arranges the tunes. The result is Protein's playful, sardonic sound influenced by Hank Williams, Pantera, and Star Wars.

Maypole's CD includes Going Dutch and Concrete Shoes

Maypole seeks to degrade the pretentiousness of art. "I'm not the mysticism of a genius, I'm a worker," says Hans. Thus the album title, Product. Many of the songs play into this same theme. The album's first single, "Concrete Shoes," uses Hans' 'bombing' technique to juxtapose the plight of the contras with people's own bitterness. "Return to Sender" mocks the moral superiority of Bob Dole's infamous statement that rap music is the nightmare of depravation, by changing it to a nightmare of your won depravation. "My Window" pokes fun at the republican poster boy/the angry white male. Even the bands name springs from these roots. Maypole comes from the Russian celebrations that marked Labor Day, the worker's day off. Maypole is not restricted to "alternative", "indie," or any other niche market.

STUDENT BODY PRESIDENT REMAINS OPTIMISTIC FOR FUTURE

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Ask Tim Riemann about his long list of achievements, and he quickly turns the question into praise for someone else.

A student body president might have reason to tell others about his accomplishments. But not Riemann. He prefers to talk about the people who helped him succeed.

Riemann, a fifth-year Kansan originally from Tennessee, gives his parents credit for his success.

"I really credit my parents for everything. They gave me the right amount of freedom — but controlled freedom. Just the right balance to help me succeed," he said.

Riemann also credits his running mate, Jennafer Neufeld, for helping communicate who he is and what the team wants to do for K-State.

He said 4-H exposed him to public speaking for the first time, but he said he still would like to improve.

"4-H was where I got my start learning how to speak in public," he said. "I still don't do it as well as I'd like to do it, but I'm certainly much better than I would be if I'd never done it.

"Now, Jennafer, she's probably the best public speaker I've ever met. I have a lot of confidence in Jennafer. I tell her all the time that things are probably better when she speaks for me than when I speak for myself."

Riemann said he and Neufeld not only complement each other, but they also offer good leadership for K-State.

"We decided that we felt that the two of us together were the best team for K-State," Riemann said.

They also decided that if either backed out, neither would run. That is something unusual in politics, Riemann said, but they wanted to work together.

"Jennafer and I don't have any problem working together because we're very close friends, so we can work through any difficulties," he said. "We can work through hard times."

There is more than just confidence behind Riemann's administration. There is also experience.

"It helps, the fact that Jennafer and I were both senators," he said. "We understand the body, we respect the body, and we respect the sacrifices that they make."

However, Riemann said, he still has trouble keeping everyone straight. He took a year off to go abroad, and several new senators were elected, but he said he hasn't let that hold him back.

"Jennafer and I believe the student body deserves to be led by the best, and we don't have any problem saying that if you want to lead the best students in the state of Kansas, then we need to be the best. Part of being the best is following the law," he said.

This philosophy shows in legislation Riemann would like to see passed in Student Senate. The legislation toughens the impeachment process if senators get a misdemeanor or felony.

Another part of leading the best students in Kansas is sacrificing time that could be spent elsewhere. Riemann said there are a lot of things he would like to do, but his responsibilities as president come first.

In the midst of his flurry of activity, Riemann is planning his future. He is not sure what he will do after graduation in May. He does plan to attend law school but has not chosen a specialization yet.

"I would like to maybe do work in low-income agriculture development," he said.

That might include traveling to Africa or possibly even joining the Peace Corps.

"I think that would be a great time for individual growth and spiritual growth — just trying to make a difference even if it is at a micro-level," Riemann said.

Community service program attracts 14 K-State students to travel abroad

BYRON VOGEL
staff reporter

The road from Cancun to Izamal, Mexico, winds across the Yucatan Peninsula like a long snake. Flanked by thick jungle on either side, it stretches west, then south, until silhouettes of ancient Mayan and Aztec pyramids begin rising toward the sky.

Izamal, a compact town of 13,000, covered by an intricate web of dirt roads and one-room houses, was one of five international cities that was host to 14 students from K-State's Community Service Program.

For Beth McCarthy, senior in community service, her arrival in Izamal marked the beginning of a nine-week volunteer project and a nine-week hiatus from the fast-paced American lifestyle. Joined by Amy Ziegler, graduate student in print journalism, and Alicia Muck, senior in psychology, the Izamal team participated in an educational summer camp for 300 community children, none of whom spoke English. The language barrier soon faded, and the new American visitors immediately drew attention.

"The first week was really hard getting used to speaking Spanish and not being able to communicate in English, but it only took a week or so to feel more comfortable," McCarthy said. "I'd be walking down the street, and people would yell out my name and wave. I didn't even know who these people were, but they knew everything about me. They knew when I got there and what I was teaching. They knew I was from Kansas and that I was in social work."

The Izamal team woke at 6 a.m. every day to exercise before walking to a foundation that housed the summer camp. There, they joined several abused and neglected children for breakfast before going to the morning session.

From 8 a.m. to noon, McCarthy, Muck, Ziegler and a teacher from San Francisco divided the children by age group and instructed them on matters of community service, ecology, manual arts and English, respectively. The afternoons gave the team a chance to converse and play games with their Mexican students. After three weeks, 150 different children arrived for the second session of camp.

"They were very smart and had very high energy, which is pretty hard to handle when you have 150 of them all together," McCarthy said. "It was pretty interesting trying to keep an eye on all of them, but it was a lot of fun. They were wonderful, wonderful kids."

Similar settings greeted K-State students in three other Latin-American cities.

In Tampico, Mexico, Andrea Bird and Laurie Harrison, both May 1997 graduates, helped develop a tourism study for the local government. The team formulated a questionnaire for tourists and area businesses by researching marketing strategies and consumer populations.

In El Calabozo, Mexico, Abra Lyman, sophomore in anthropology, and Chris Kellogg, senior in Spanish, collaborated with a technical team to conduct a community and regional needs assessment. They also educated community members about smaller topics like water preservation.

This summer was the first time El Papaturro, El Salvador, was host to an international team.

James Komatz, senior in geography, and Marry Copple, graduate student in Spanish literature, worked on a needs assessment for El Papaturro to be used as a foundation for future projects. They also recorded individual residents' accounts of war in El Salvador.

Five more K-State students spent 10 weeks in the Jordan capital of Amman, just inland from continental Africa's west coast. Members of this team were Juan Carlos Cordero, senior in natural resources and agronomy; Michelle Crago, junior in business and family studies; Josie Pike, senior in foods and nutrition and kinesiology; Aaron Rice, senior in construction science and management; and Ruth Rostocil, senior in psychology.

The Amman team worked on projects similar to those of the other teams, such as English education, agriculture and micro-enterprise. However, according to Rostocil, culture shock for her group remained at a minimum.

"We lived in a very westernized area," Rosticil said. "All the signs were written in English in addition to Arabic, and the family we stayed with spoke English.

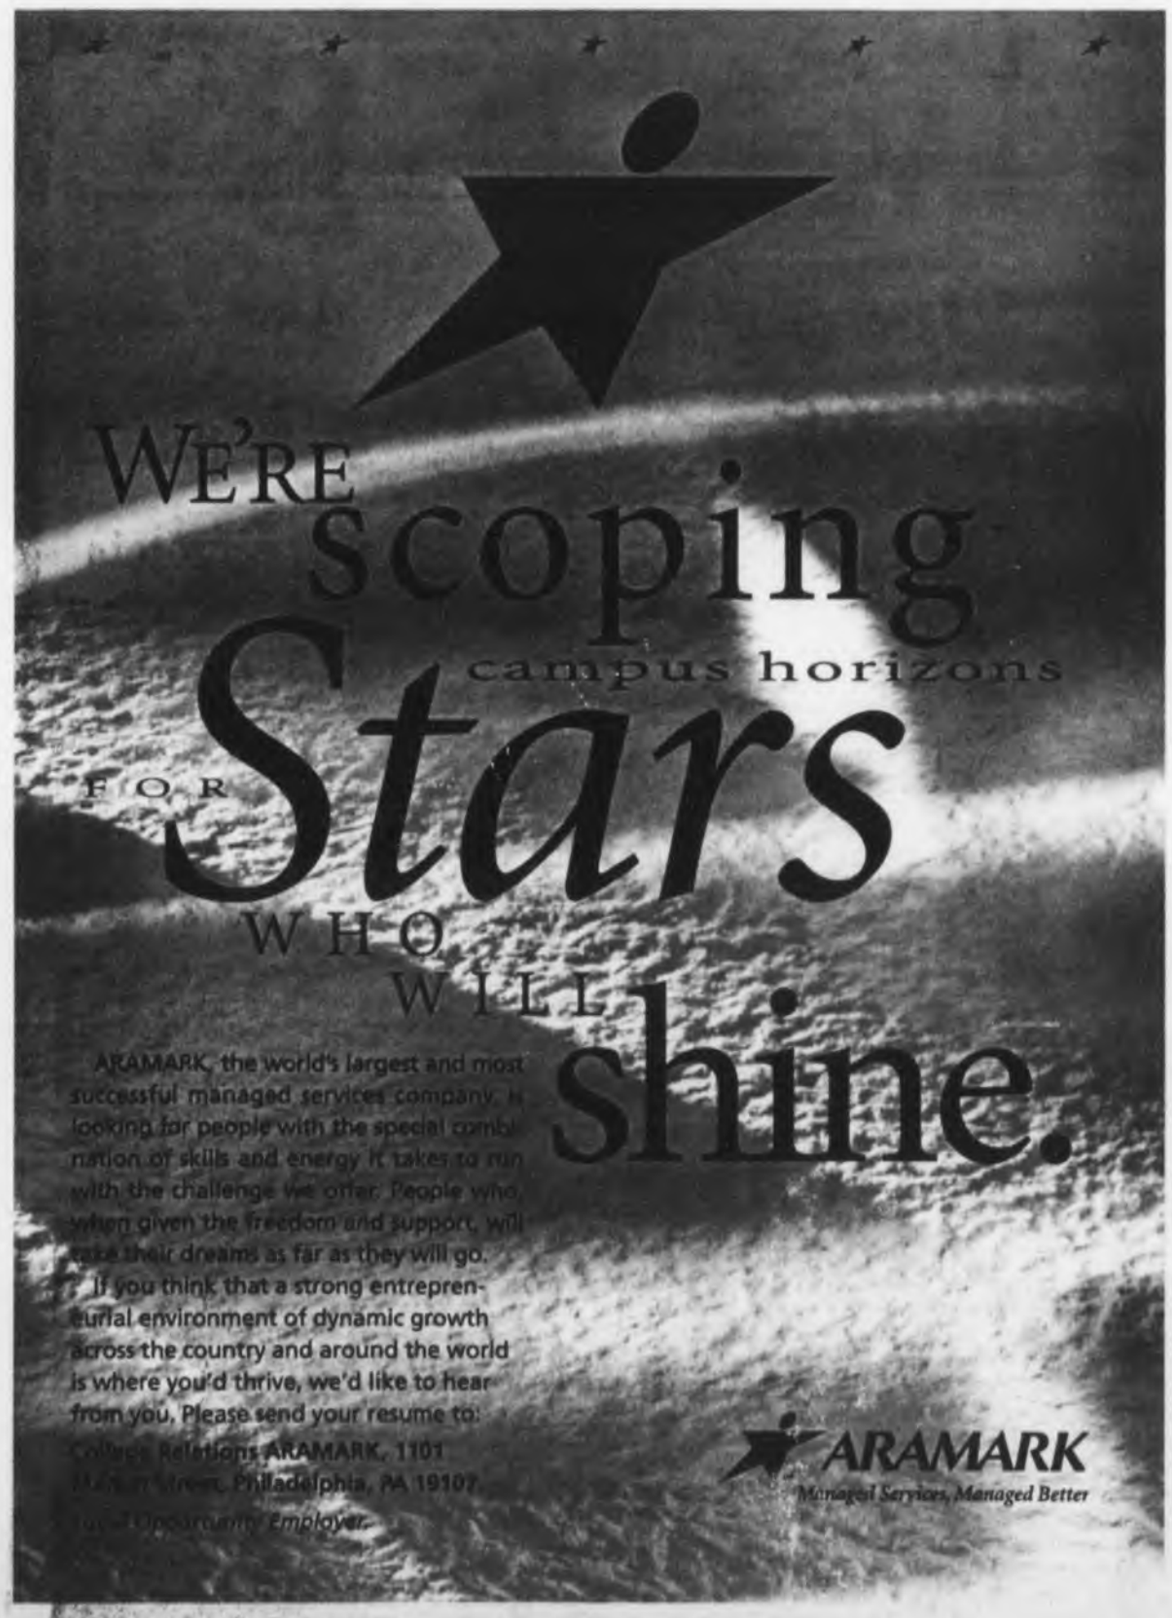
"It really made me think about foreign language programs and how so many non-Americans can speak English, but hardly anybody in America speaks a foreign language."

All 14 students will reconvene this semester to attend reflection classes. Rebiha Abuzeineh, international teams student coordinator, said initial feedback raised many of the same issues of previous years.

"Many teams had great summers. We had one conflict because there were only a couple of team members who ended up not getting along," she said. "Sometimes that happens because people experience the extremes of their personalities. Even though some people had negative experiences, whether it was with their team or with some other aspect of adapting to the new culture, they still learned from that."

Abuzeineh said the Community Service Program is always searching for students to participate on international teams.

"We look for students with personality types that would help them work on teams well. Skills in certain academic areas are important, but so are life skills. For instance, someone who grew up on a farm, even if they aren't taking courses in agriculture, would be valuable in a community that requested someone to teach about agriculture," she said.



"The team members are always so diverse as far as their personalities and their majors, but certainly some of the things that tie them all together are their interest in service learning, people, citizenship and fulfilling their responsibility to their communities."

McCarthy, who plans to return to Izamal next summer and in subsequent years, said it was important to look at the United States from the outside.

"It's a very different world when you see America from their point of view and not just ours," she said. "It's so sad because by our standards they have nothing, but they are the happiest people I have ever met. They don't have material things, but they have such a strong sense of community that they're willing to help anybody and everybody."

McCarthy said she most cherishes the fact that she now has "another family."

"It was hard not having any of my friends or family there, but I got over that fairly quickly because these people became my family. I guarantee they will be a part of my life always," McCarthy said. "It's such an amazing feeling you get helping other people. It's not even something you can explain until you actually do it. Helping someone is helping someone, whether it's next door or a thousand miles away, and the feeling you get from that will change you forever."

Students should network for jobs at today's Career Fair

The real world. We joke about it. We look forward to it. We dread it. And it's barreling toward us at a terribly high rate of speed. Are you ready?

First things first — in the real world, you need a job. And lucky for you, Career and Employment Services is ready to aid you in your search, sponsoring the annual Career Fair from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union .

About 240 prospective employers, ranging from the Aerospace Corp. to Zeneca Pharmaceuticals, will be in attendance. They'll be looking for the bright, young rising star (that's you) who would be just the right fit for their companies.

This is an incredible opportunity for any student. A few hours at the Career Fair could save you a bundle in dry-cleaning services, stamps, gas and shoe leather. That time could net you some valuable contact names or an interview with your dream company.

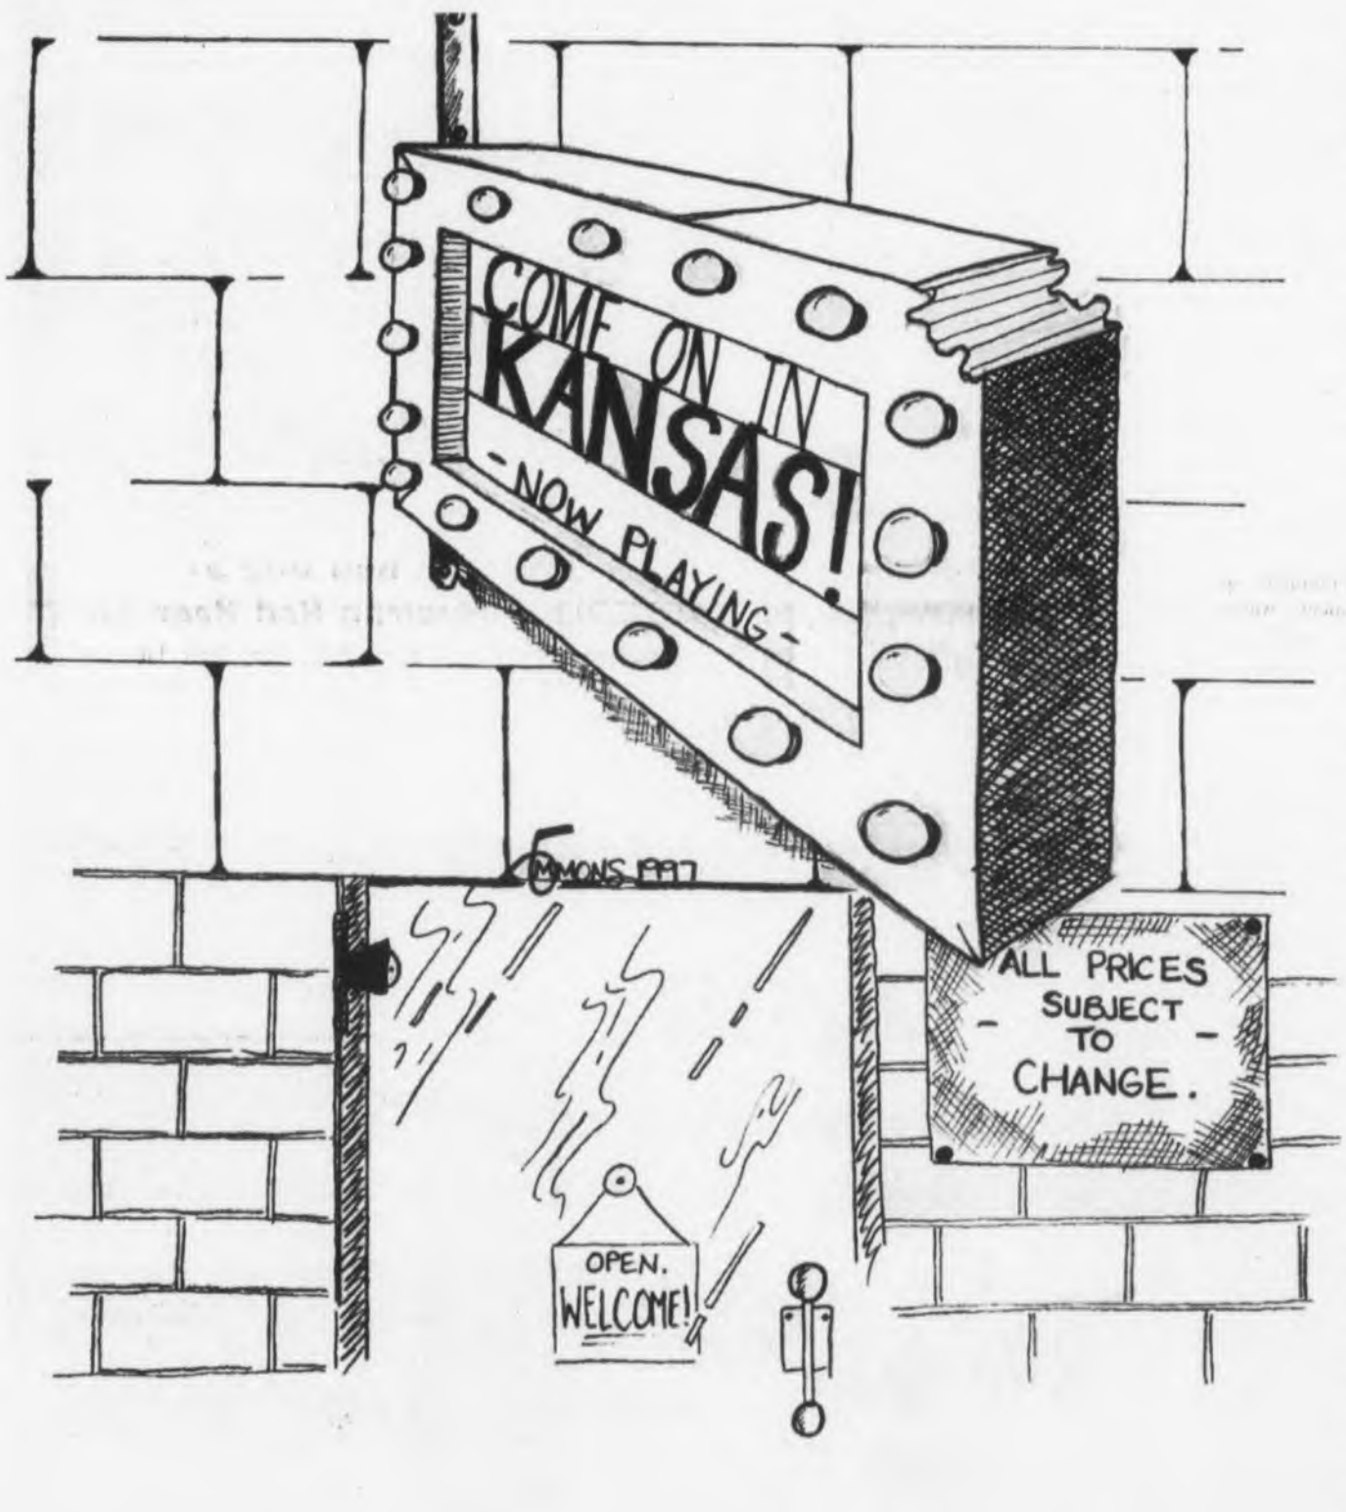
It's a good deal. Take advantage of it.

Show up in your business attire with an armful of résumés (CES suggests bringing 50) and your best smile. Be ready to give each prospective employer a short spiel about yourself — your name, major, interests and career goals.

Collect business cards, and keep a running list of interesting companies so you can send a follow-up letter to remind them of you.

For those of you who aren't about to graduate, the Career Fair might not seem of utmost importance to you. Go anyway. It's always good to see what opportunities are out there, in case you're thinking the major you're in now isn't exactly working out.

Meeting with these professionals can't hurt. They can probably tell you what you need to work on if you want to land a job with a company like theirs some day down the road. Practicing first interviews can't be a bad thing.



If you're one of those for whom the real world is down the road a little, make sure you are courteous of the soon-to-be graduates' time. You'll be able to tell who they are by the nauseated looks on their faces.

Kansas needs more than cattle-feed chat to survive economically; residents must show signs of intelligence

Every so often, a leading metropolitan newspaper publishes the results of a phone or mail survey where respondents are asked to rank the 50 states in terms of their attractiveness as travel destinations.

In other places such surveys, statistically uncontrolled as they are, usually wind up on the travel page with stuff about cheap vacations in Greece and other scuttlebutt.

But in Kansas papers, like The Wichita Eagle, they usually wind up on the front page with famous deaths and corruption and the like, because they usually contain dire and predictable news about economic development in this state.

Why? Because the occupant of the No. 1 slot usually varies. Sometimes it's New York for high culture, Maine for its rocky coastline, Massachusetts for Boston and its artifacts of New England patriots, Colorado for the mountains or Texas for down-home hospitality with Southwestern flavor.

But one state is usually number 50, or at any rate in the bottom five, and it is us. When rankings are accompanied with comments, the same remarks are made about Kansas again and again — it's a flat, boring, empty wasteland without a single thing to see, something to be crossed on an interstate highway at top speed, at night if possible.

Why should we bother with tourists who can't be troubled to slow down except to eat our food and consume our gasoline at roadside restaurants and truck stops and dump their sewage at rest areas?

The answer, uncomfortable as it may be to the xenophobes among ourselves, is that these locusts become real human beings when they get back home and make decisions about where they want to live and where they want to locate companies.

A perception that Kansas is not welcoming to visitors is, in itself, fatal. But so is an impression that Kansas has nothing to offer its visitors, no matter how hospitable its people may be.

At the moment, Kansas, as an agricultural state that produces commodities like wheat, cattle and oil with minimum value addition, is vulnerable to natural cataclysms that make it impossible to continue commodity production. This can include catastrophes like a fresh Dust Bowl such as spring 1996 threatened to become or the depletion of our economically recoverable oil and gas deposits or the failure of the salt beds under Hutchinson, Kan.

We have attempted to stabilize our economy by encouraging light manufacturing, such as aircraft assembly in Wichita or electric-car making in Manhattan. But these put a certain tax upon the environment.

Our best hope for economic development and environmental responsibility is to attract industries that add extremely large amounts of value at relatively little cost, such as computer programming, some kinds of aerospace manufacturing or tourism.

Colorado aggressively recruited high-tech companies beginning in the late 1950s when its population was no greater than Kansas' at the time. Both mining and truck-farming, two commodity-producing activities that had been the whole of the Colorado economy, had been in a slump for 40 years except for a short revival during the war years.

North Carolina developed Research Triangle Park to encourage the greater value addition of high-tech industries and ease its dependence upon tobacco and the textile mills. For Seattle, Portland, Ore., and San Jose, Calif., the stories are similar.

Those places have all priced themselves out of further development. Seattle and Portland have maxed out on their growth plans. Colorado is running out of water and began turning away new companies in the 1980s. California and North Carolina both have oppressively high income taxes.

JONATHAN WINKLER

JONATHAN WINKLER is a senior in physics. You can send e-mail to Jonathan at jnw@ksu.edu.

Kansas is the next logical high-tech mecca, or it would be if it had something approximating the cultural attractions of these places, and cities with some form of livable community space, such as active downtowns or shopping districts where people actually want to go after work, instead of incipient sprawl.

Because most American cities offer the same amenities — McDonald's Restaurants, Wal-Mart, a supermarket of some kind and easy access to running water and sewage — location finders for high-tech industries look at less tangible factors.

They seek signs that a community thinks, because high-tech work depends upon intellectual stimulation. They look at the pictures in the art museum, they find out what sort of books people like to read, and most importantly, they look at how people spend their leisure time and whether they talk and if so, about what.

Sprawl in Seattle and Portland would have to get very bad before one of these would confuse casual talk at the local feed store with serious discussion about the future of object-oriented code in a West Coast coffeehouse.

I put the natural places in Kansas, such as Castle Rock or the Chalk Pyramids, the Konza Prairie and Alcove Spring, ahead of the Cascades near Seattle or the Rockies near Denver or the Great Smokies in North Carolina.

But for this state to advance it must learn to understand its visitors' craving for mental civilization, and begin to realize that intellectual and cultural sophistication is a vital ancillary to economic development rather than a feature of coastal decadence.

ramblings on law suits, halogen lamps and driving

BOYD FERRIS

BOYD FERRIS is a senior in electrical engineering. You can send e-mail to Boyd at ferris@ksu.edu.

Let's ramble about some irritating occurrences. Silly lawsuits irritate me, especially when the people who sue win.

Perhaps you remember the woman who won her suit against McDonald's Restaurants. She got burned after spilling hot coffee on herself, and she blamed McDonald's for her injury.

She got her money.

How about the suit filed by a grandmother against Disneyland? She claimed her grandchildren where traumatized after seeing Disneyland characters removing their costume heads.

Apparently, the realization that incredibly oversized, human-like plastic mice aren't real was too much for these kids. She got her money, and she's going to need it. Just think how much therapy is going to cost for her grandchildren after they find out about Santa Claus and the Easter Bunny.

What's going to be the next ridiculous lawsuit? A chronically absent student suing an instructor for not doing enough to encourage him to attend class.

Manufacturers of halogen lamps should probably watch out for lawsuits concerning a few fires caused by the lamps, which brings up another thing that irritates me — people who lack common sense.

What moron throws flammable material over a halogen lamp? Those things are hot!

If seeing mindless bugs flying into the lamp and disintegrating into a puff of smoke isn't enough to indicate the extreme temperature, then feeling the enormous heat emanating from the lamp should give a clue.

Also, what about the warning label? The manufacturers warn the consumers about the possible fire hazard.

All of these observations should indicate to people not to put flammable material near the lamp, such as drapes or actually putting cloth over the top.

Most people have the common sense to live without fear of the halogen lamp. After all, about 40 million people use the lamp without any problem.

There are only 189 morons that somehow don't get it.

I guess those 189 people are part of the natural selection process of Darwin's evolutionary theory. Eleven of them are definitely out of the gene pool. In a few more thousand years, we will no longer be bothered with morons.

Morons are definitely irritating, especially when they are driving. Almost everybody knows the fast-lane rule on a two-lane highway, but there are still people who travel slowly in the fast lane. Now breaking this rule isn't that big of a deal, because you can just go around them in the other lane.

However, if two slow-driving moronic drivers are side by side, then almost every driver quickly becomes irritated.

These people should realize that you want to get past them, but they don't. They sit there side by side, ignorant of the existence of your car and all others that are desperately waiting to get by.

There are also drivers who do not understand the right-of-way concept, especially at the intersection of Manhattan Avenue and Moro Street in Aggieville. Some people stop on Moro Street before traveling onto Manhattan Avenue, but they don't have to. In fact, it annoys people when they do.

The people on Moro Street don't have a stop sign. They have the right of way. The people traveling south on Manhattan Avenue have the stop sign. They're the ones who have to stop.

However, some people still stop on Moro Street, which is kind of irritating. In order to make it clear to some of these confused drivers, Varsity Theater put instructions on their sign, indicating that you can keep driving and not stop. Unfortunately, some people still miss the well-lit sign.

Irritations can come from any place, but if people would think clearly, then most of these annoyances would disappear.

Shuttle usage increases in 2nd year

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

After a year of service, the parking shuttle is seeing more usage from the community.

The service was started after a few non-academic departments moved away from campus. The moves created a need for a parking shuttle to transport people to and from campus.

During its first year, the parking shuttle averaged 40-45 passengers a day. So far this semester, that number has jumped to 60-65 passengers a day.

"It takes a bit of time to get used to," Lance Lunsway, manager of External Operations, said.

"Right now, students are willing to take the risk of finding a parking space 10 minutes before their class," Lunsway said.

Students who most frequently use the parking shuttle are Jardine Terrace residents and those who need to get to Edwards Hall, the KSU Foundation or any other buildings off campus.

"I think it's doing well overall, but it could be publicized a little bit more," Dale Roberts, parking shuttle driver, said.

Parking Services funds the parking shuttle, which runs from 7:45 a.m. to 5:07 p.m. on days classes are in session.

Phone boxes can now be used for more than emergency calls

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

A student stranded after night class with a flat tire who might be unable to reach a friend for assistance can now use the phone boxes around campus. The phone boxes used to read "Emergency."

Regardless of the wording, the emergency phone boxes in the K-State parking lots can be used for other situations, said Ronnie Grice, director of K-State Police.

Grice said in the future the boxes will read "Emergency/Assistance/Information" so students will be more likely to use the phones regardless of their definition of what an emergency is.

Grice said that when a student was stranded last year, that student did not use the phone because the word "emergency" was printed on the outside.

Because of misconceptions like this, campus police and Telecommunications decided to change the signs on these boxes, Grice said.

Fred Damkroger, director of Telecommunications, said students are taking the word "emergency" to its extreme.

"The labeling says emergency, and the students are taking that literally," Damkroger said. "They are also for the not-quite-so severe situations."

Damkroger also said Telecommunications will pay to change the templates, but it will be at least a month before all signs have been changed.

Grice said that even though all the signs haven't been changed yet, they can still be used for escort needs and general information questions.

"We want to encourage students and faculty to ask for assistance, whether it's an emergency or not," Grice said. "It doesn't matter."

However, he added, they should not be used for fun and games.

Amy Duncan, senior in psychology, said it is a good idea to change the wording on the signs.

"I thought they were just for emergencies," Duncan said. "It'll make it a lot easier for everybody."

There are 21 phone boxes on campus, including two recent ones added at Goodnow Hall and Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. When dialed, the phones ring into the dispatcher for campus police. Campus police test the phones every Monday to ensure they are working.

Wage hike does not equal job cuts

AT A GLANCE

NO MINIMUM WAGE CAMPUS JOBS WILL BE JEOPARDIZED BY THE NATIONAL MINIMUM WAGE INCREASE

BYRON VOGEL
staff reporter

None of the 1,300 minimum wage campus jobs will be jeopardized by the recent 40-cent per hour pay increase. Some student employee hours, however, might be reduced to buffer the 3.5 percent payroll increase.

The minimum wage bill passed by Congress in August 1996 provided a 50-cent raise for minimum wage employees beginning last Oct. 1 and a 40-cent raise to $5.15 per hour this Sept. 1.

Because K-State's fiscal budget runs from July to June, the university was not prepared for the initial increase last October, but it was ready for the second increase this fall.

"We realized at budget time this would be a concern, and we brought before the Student Senate our budget, which included last year's 50-cent and this year's 40-cent increases," said Jack Thoman, assistant director and budget manager of the K-State Student Union.

Thoman said some work hours will be sacrificed to maintain the current number of Union employees.

"At this stage, the hours are set. The managers at different areas know how many hours they need and can plan accordingly," Thoman said.

Excluding the payroll of contracted food service, the wage increase will add $30,000 to the Union's budget for the remainder of the fiscal year.

The increase isn't likely to threaten any of the 125 student food service positions, most of which are minimum wage.

"Our business is based on sales, so the number of students we employ at minimum wage most likely isn't going to change," said Chartwells director Paul Stolle.

"Right now, our goal is to keep the traffic pattern for the bulk of our customers where it is and to incorporate the Union as a whole in our marketing strategy so we can keep our current employment level," he said.

In addition to the 1,300 students affected by the minimum wage increase, other campus employees will receive comparable raises, according to Jennifer Gehrt, associate director of Human Resources

"We have a lot of students who are paid at minimum wage, but then we have many also who are already paid at a higher rate. When they raised the minimum wage, a lot of those students' wages were raised, too. They weren't just making minimum wage along with the rest of the people who had just gotten raises," she said.

Martin Gramatica's fairy tale has happy ending against Ohio

Martin Gramatica took a storytelling class.

On the first day of class, he showed up with his copper complexion slightly deepened from the week in San Diego where he kicked five extra points in the Holiday Bowl.

He sat in class during the spring of his sophomore year telling the usual stories about heroes and heroines, about good guys beating the bad guys, about dragons and white unicorns.

For an assignment one day, he showed the class how to kick a field goal and booted a football, which ricocheted off the ceiling of Nichols Hall and nearly killed the teacher. He taught basketball players Elliot Hatcher and Stanley Hamilton how to kick a field goal. He taught the entire class, one at a time, how to kick a field goal, and before long, footballs echoed throughout Nichols.

Hey, he needed practice. He needed to keep the leg warm because of the past season, where his opportunities to kick field goals were so sparse.

Still, in 1995 he connected on seven of his 10 field goal attempts. Two of his misses came from 52 yards against Oklahoma and 54 yards against Akron.

Little did Gramatica know that the echoing kicks in Nichols would be some of the last he'd have for a year.

In the week before to the 1996 season-opener against Texas Tech, Gramatica suffered a season-ending injury to his left knee. He spent his medical redshirt year on the sidelines, hunched over on crutches and waited for his opportunity to kick again.

Gramatica went through intense rehabilitation, and he treated the injured left knee like gold. He kicked a 64-yard field goal during spring practice and wasn't afraid to tell me about the feat during K-State's football media day.

His brown eyes sparkled like a 10-year-old kid's before his birthday party.

Some offensive linemen are on the field for 70 snaps a game. Gramatica knew his opportunities were limited. He was determined to make each one count. He wasn't going to miss again.

After Saturday, everyone was telling stories about Gramatica. He was the hero. He was the good guy. Under the KSU Stadium field lights, his copper complexion glowed. He kicked and made three field goals and made two of the longest field goals he had ever made during a game.

The field goal unit lined up for a 52-yard field goal in the first quarter, and all the frustration of sitting out an entire year was unleashed in a single kick. Gramatica showed Coach Bill Snyder, his teammates and 42,097 fans in the Purple Pit what he knew all along: he can make it.

As long as he gets the opportunity.

The football traveled straight though the uprights, like a saw blade through a 2-by-4, and into the 28th row. The kick could have gone from 64 yards, easily. The kick was a career-high.

Gramatica threw his fists in the air. Suddenly, his 5-9, 170-pound frame towered above the field like a king among commoners. He jumped into the arms of his linemen and was carried to the sideline and embraced other players.

But wait. In the second quarter, Gramatica strapped on his helmet and trotted out on the field to attempt a 55-yard field goal.

Could he do it? Could he slay the demons, get the monkey off his back and become the victor again with a stroke of his leg?

The kick was lower than the first, but split the uprights for a new career-high. The referees raised their arms. Gramatica pumped his fists, jumped on his linemen, then raced toward Snyder. He almost jumped on his coach.

But Gramatica knew better than to attack the man who gave him the opportunity to be king for a night. Despite a 23-0 lead at the time against Ohio, his team looked shabby. It wasn't a good time to jump on the coach for a warm embrace.

Saturday night was no fairy tale.

For the K-State football team, which beat Ohio 23-20, it was a nightmare.

For Gramatica, it was a dream come true.

After the game, Gramatica thanked God. He dedicated his kicks of brilliance to his parents and brothers. He thanked Snyder for the opportunity and for having the confidence to send him out on the field.

"He doesn't know if he's going to get one, two, three, four, five or zero opportunities," Snyder said. "It's magnified."

The pressure was magnified. The feeling of walking onto the field under the lights with everything riding on his leg was magnified.

"If I had a dream, I don't think it would be as good as this one," Gramatica said. "This is the best reward I could ever ask for."

Especially when the football rests 54 yards away from its final destination. You're the shortest and lightest player on the field, and you're given the opportunity of a lifetime.

Gramatica made good on his opportunity.

Cross country team makes strides at weekend race

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Last weekend in Lawrence, the women's and men's cross country teams raced over the hills to second- and third-place finishes, respectively.

"This meet gave us the opportunity to race on a good, challenging course against some quality opponents," Coach Randy Cole said.

Fourteen teams competed on the men's side and 11 on the women's, with teams like Michigan, Kansas and Oklahoma all giving the Wildcats a run for their money.

"Michigan is one of the top NCAA teams," Cole said. "Butler County Community College is probably the odds-on favorite to win the national junior college title."

It was also the first meet that the teams competed at the standard race distances of 5,000 meters for women and 8,000 meters for men.

"Our first meet last week at home, the women ran two miles, and the men ran four," Cole said. "At the first meet, you open up with a shorter distance to get their feet wet."

As a result, Cole said signs of improvement were evident in the teams' sticking together.

"Their concentration was better," Cole said. "They were running together as a pack, as a team. At our first meet, we let them go and they were all over the place."

Cole said freshman Annie Wetterhus moved out front early on, but fellow team members Kelly Andra and Morgan Kadel hung back when they had the ability to move up soon.

"Annie Wetterhus got right into the mix from the start and ran a solid race," he said. "Annie got right up with the lead pack early. Kelly and Morgan were tentative, and it was Morgan's first race. They were way back through the first mile."

Wetterhus finished fourth overall with a time of 19:03. Andra was 12th and Kadel 16th, finishing within 10 seconds of each other.

On the men's side, Cole said freshman Brandon Jessop, who finished at the top for the Cats in 17th place with a time of 27:06, learned what to improve on for the future at this race.

"Brandon did what we told him to do," Cole said. "He'll know next time he can be more aggressive. He made a good step forward as our top finisher."

The men were in the first half of the pack for the first couple of miles, Cole said, and performed to his expectations. Zach Davies finished in 19th place with a time of 27:08, and Brent Stover placed 25th with a time of 27:29.

"Our guys showed patience but need to keep their composure during the 'discomfort zone' of the race," he said. "Zach and Brent both had bad patches in the middle of the race. They got out well in the beginning, but struggled a bit."

Above all, meeting Cole's expectations was the key to the team's success this weekend, he said.

"We had signs of improvement in that we stuck to our own race plans pretty well," Cole said. "There was a bit of tentativeness on the part of some of our people, but with more race experience they will be more aggressive."

Tau Kappa Epsilon dominates intramural football rankings

MICHAEL RYAN
staff reporter

If the K-State football team is running short on players this season, it might want to consider asking members of Tau Kappa Epsilon to try out.

Not only is the TKE house team ranked No. 1 overall in the men's flag football intramural division, but its independent team is ranked No. 3. Throw in the fact that a few TKEs play for the No. 6-ranked Team Rooster and a few more play on the No. 1-ranked co-rec team, the Pink Tacos, and you begin to realize there are some athletes in the house.

"Everybody in our house likes athletics," Steve Eck, TKE intramural manager, said.

The TKE house team has tryouts, and the players who don't make the house team play on the independent team, Eck said. He said there are about 30 TKEs participating in flag football.

The defending fraternity champion has eight freshmen on this year's house team, Eck said. The team will be led by Jared Jackson, a junior third-year starter at quarterback.

Alpha Chi Omega received the No. 1 ranking in the women's division after winning the Puff Bowl championship last season.

Stephanie Settle, sophomore wide receiver and defensive end, said the team is looking to win the championship again this year.

"We only lost two players from last year, and we have a new freshman center that looks promising," she said.

Settle said she loves playing flag football.

"It's very competitive, but it's fun competing against the other houses because we know so many other people," she said.

The football season is now in its second week.

Defensive players diminish on Wildcat's roster after Ohio's chop blocking causes injuries

McIntosh

Williams

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

After the Ohio game Saturday, the number of injured defensive players jumped from one to three.

Two starters, middle linebacker Turelle Williams and defensive tackle Damion McIntosh, were injured by Bobcats' illegal chop blocks.

"Last night in all cases, it was somebody blocking below the waist," coach Bill Snyder said. "Both of the injuries we suffered last night were the result of chop blocking."

Williams, a sophomore from St. Louis, Mo., was injured in the first series of the game and will be out for the season. He spent ample time last year backing up DeShawn Fogle.

McIntosh was injured in the second half. McIntosh is out indefinitely.

"We have lost Turelle for the season and Damion for an extensive period of time," Snyder said in a teleconference Monday.

Williams is eligible for a medical hardship ruling, but McIntosh and cornerback Adrian Beard, who was injured at Northern Illinois Sept. 6, have no redshirt year left.

All three players are suffering from torn anterior cruciate ligaments. Beard's surgery is pending.

Snyder had warned officials of the Bobcats' penchant for illegal blocking to prevent his players from being injured.

"There were flags thrown in both instances, but that was after the fact," Snyder said.

Williams recorded one tackle for a loss of three yards in the game against Ohio. He recovered a fumble and tallied three tackles against Northern Illinois.

McIntosh has yet to record a tackle this season.

Volleyball sweeps weekend match, improves to 6-1

SAM FELSENFELD
staff reporter

Granted, the members of the K-State volleyball team are athletes, but lately, they've been sticking to housecleaning.

In the past two weeks, all they've done is sweep everything that's come in front of them.

The Wildcats (6-1) recorded their fourth consecutive 3-0 victory Saturday and will try to extend their streak tonight at Ahearn Field House against Southwest Missouri State at 7 p.m.

After a Sept. 3 three-game win over the University of Texas-Arlington and a 3-0 victory against Wichita State on Wednesday, the Cats rolled through the Boise State Tournament last weekend. The Cats beat Eastern Washington on Friday and Boise State on Saturday.

"This is the best we've played all year," said K-State coach Jim McLaughlin after the match against Eastern Washington. "We played well in three phases of the game. We played well when we were ahead. We showed ability to come from behind, and during side-out wars. We drew blood on every occasion to break the exchange."

Against Eastern Washington, K-State started slowly, finding itself tied 4-4 in game one. But the Cats went on an 8-0 run on the way to closing out the first game.

In the second game, the Cats gave fans a reason to be nervous. The team appeared to be cruising through the game, holding leads of 6-2 and 9-4, but the Eagles went on a 5-0 run to tie the match and eventually took a 13-11 lead.

However, Eastern Washington couldn't close out K-State, and the Cats fought back to take the game 16-14. K-State struggled to win game three but still managed to sweep the Eagles.

Although McLaughlin said the match against Eastern Washington was the best K-State had played, he didn't say it was the best K-State could play.

"We can still improve," he said. "Our coverage was sloppy, and our ball control on easy plays was sloppy."

On Saturday, the Cats recorded a 3-0 win over Boise State but only won the three games by a combined total of 10 points. However, K-State showed it could do something it hasn't needed to do for most of the season — come from behind to pull out a game.

The Cats fell behind Boise State 10-3 in the first game but went on a 12-3 run to take a 1-0 lead.

"We're playing well in tough situations. We tend to elevate when we have to," McLaughlin said.

In game two, K-State's play mirrored Boise State's run through the first game. The Cats jumped to an 8-0 lead, but Boise State came back. K-State faced game-point when Boise State led 14-12, but it went on a 4-0 run to win the game.

The Cats won a 12th-straight game with a little less trouble, topping Boise State 15-9 in game three to close out the match.

"I think we played well when we had to, but from start to finish, our play was rough," McLaughlin said. "I think we beat a pretty good team, but we're still not taking care of any opportunities to score."

The Cats' game tonight can be heard on KSDB-FM 91.9, with Brent Stover calling the play-by-play and former Cat swing hitter Kelli Luther, who finished her K-State career last season, on commentary.

Students coordinate events for lectures

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

Several K-State students will get to know campus speakers a little better.

These students are serving as interns for the Lou Douglas Lecture Series this fall.

"It's a really good opportunity to meet the speakers on a one-on-one basis," said Zarry Tavakkol, intern and junior in biology.

The lecture series began in 1980 in honor of Douglas, a former political science professor at K-State. It addresses public issues and is sponsored by UFM.

The intern program has been operating since the early 1980s and has grown in recent years.

"In the past, there were not as many interns, only two or three," said Vickie Choitz, Lou Douglas Lecture Series coordinator. Now there are 10 interns.

In this yearlong program, interns coordinate and publicize the lecture series.

"Throughout the fall and into the spring, we come up with ideas for the next year," said David Shrack, senior in accounting.

The interns are divided into three committees.

The advertising committee publicizes the series by distributing posters, sending fliers to professors, writing news releases and speaking to organizations.

A second committee designs posters and fliers. It also creates dinner invitations for the patron dinner before each lecture.

The lecture committee oversees the day of each event. It provides a shuttle for patrons from the dinner to the lecture. This committee sets up the stage and assists the speaker with last-minute preparations.

"It's a good opportunity to learn how to organize events," Choitz said.

Students are nominated by faculty, and Choitz screens the applications.

"Typically, we have 20 to 30 applicants," she said.

The intern program is a volunteer opportunity that students enjoy because of the people they meet.

"It's a lot of work on top of school and work," Tavakkol said. "Once the speakers come and we get to meet them and work with them, it will be worth it."

James Howard Kunstler is the first speaker in the series. He will present "Can America Survive Suburbia?" at 7:30 p.m. today in Umberger 105.

Some of lecture series to be aired on C-SPAN

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

The Lou Douglas Lecture Series is moving from the university level to national air time on C-SPAN this fall.

C-SPAN will be coming to K-State to tape at least two or three of the five lectures in the series.

It is unknown which lectures C-SPAN will tape. C-SPAN will notify the university several days before its arrival.

"They are going to give us a two- to-three day advance notice, and then we'll spring into action," said David Shrack, lecture series intern and senior in accounting.

The 10 lecture series interns and coordinator Vickie Choitz contacted C-SPAN about getting coverage. The station then contacted them and agreed to tape some lectures.

Shrack is in charge of guiding the C-SPAN visits, along with the help of his fellow lecture series interns.

"I'll guide them around campus, answer any questions they may have and just make sure they get set up," Shrack said.

The lectures will be in Umberger 105, which has some new technological improvements that are ideal for C-SPAN's equipment, Shrack said.

"They'll have a great location to shoot from," he said.

The lectures will then be aired on C-SPAN, but the air time could be between one week to a few months after the lectures.

"All the lectures that will be taped will be aired this year," Choitz said. "They will probably be aired around Thanksgiving or Christmas when Congress is in recess."

Once they are notified of when the lectures will air, Choitz said she plans to locally publicize the C-SPAN coverage through committee members, faculty, patrons, newspapers and radio.

Choitz and the lecture series interns said they are excited about the series receiving national TV coverage.

"It's exciting because we're a relatively small lecture series as compared to lectures that draw in thousands of people," Choitz said.

"The Lou Douglas Lecture Series is a great series. I'm hoping it will beef up the participation and bring more people to the lectures," said Rob MacDougall II, lecture series intern and junior in social work and political science.

Satellite detects warm water mass larger than U.S.

▶ Look it up on the World Wide Web. Curious what El Nino is? Want to know more? Check out www.pme1.noaa.gov/toga-tao/el-nino-story.html for an explanation with maps and charts.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — The strongest satellite evidence yet of a powerful, weather-disrupting El Nino shows that a warm water mass off South America's Pacific coast has grown to 1 1/2 times the size of the continental United States, NASA scientists said Monday.

The warm mass was only two-thirds its current size just four months ago.

In another indication of El Nino's powerful hand, water vapor measurements from another satellite are providing signs that the southwestern United States could get pounded this winter with Pineapple Express storms crossing the Pacific from Hawaii.

The weather phenomenon El Nino occurs when westward-blowing trade winds weaken, allowing a mass of warm water normally sitting off Australia to drive eastward to western South America. The unusually warm water acts on jet stream patterns, altering weather worldwide.

Scientists at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena announced in May that satellite data showed an El Nino brewing. Weather experts worldwide have since said 1997-98 could bring the worst El Nino in 150 years.

"As the satellite has mapped El Nino across the Pacific, what we've seen continually throughout the summer and into September now is that early indications actually have persisted and intensified," said Bill Patzert, a research oceanographer with the TOPEX-Poseidon project at JPL.

The TOPEX-Poseidon satellite looks at sea height. Because water expands as it heats up, the higher the sea, the warmer the water. The satellite bounces radar signals off the ocean's surface to measure the precise distance from the satellite.

Secondary signs of an El Nino are appearing off North America with warm-water fish migrating north this summer and the fueling of Hurricane Linda, the strongest-ever eastern Pacific hurricane, off Mexico last weekend.

An instrument called the Microwave Limb Sounder aboard the Upper Atmosphere Research Satellite is detecting "an unusually large buildup of water vapor in the atmosphere" about 8 miles up, said William Read, a JPL researcher. That's the most vapor seen since an El Nino of 1991-92, he said.

"Increased water vapor at these heights can be associated with more intense wintertime storm activity from the Pineapple Express, a pattern of atmospheric motions that brings tropical moisture from Hawaii to the southwestern United States," Read said.

FDA slims diet pill choices, takes 2 off market

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. — Two of the nation's most popular diet drugs were pulled off the market Monday after the government uncovered disturbing new evidence that they could seriously damage patients' hearts.

The Food and Drug Administration urged millions of dieters to immediately stop taking Redux, also known as dexfenfluramine, and Pondimin, also known as fenfluramine.

Pondimin is one-half of the wildly popular fen-phen diet combination; the other half, phentermine, appears safe when used by itself, the FDA said.

But doctors said phentermine, the sole remaining prescription diet drug, has only mixed results — and they predicted a surge of patients distraught both at the possibility their hearts were damaged and at losing their treatments.

"We are anticipating lots of very desperate patients that need help," said Dr. John Foreyt, an obesity expert at Baylor College of Medicine.

"Obesity does kill," said Dr. Richard Atkinson of the American Obesity Association, who said many Redux and Pondimin users will regain their weight.

The FDA asked Wyeth-Ayerst Laboratories, which sells Redux here and whose parent company makes Pondimin, to withdraw the drugs because of new evidence that they damage heart valves, and the firm agreed.

The U.S. decision prompted the French company, Servier, that sells fenfluramine and dexfenfluramine abroad to withdraw the drugs worldwide.

The FDA had been struggling to determine the drugs' risk since it and the Mayo Clinic uncovered the first cases in July. Last week, the FDA analyzed heart tests on 291 dieters and found almost a third — 92 people — had damaged heart valves, even though they had no symptoms.

That's much higher than anticipated. Less than 1 percent of the general population has such damage to their aortic or mitral valves, said Dr. Richard Bowen of Naples, Fla., who tested 200 of the patients.

Most of the valves leaked blood, a condition that over time can enlarge the heart and seriously weaken it.

Also, the FDA analyzed 25 patients who happened to have had their hearts tested before ever taking diet pills — and after taking the pills, about a third were newly diagnosed with valve damage.

Those patients are in addition to 99 other fenfluramine or Redux users whose doctors have reported to FDA actual symptoms of heart damage, such as shortness of breath, chest pain or swollen ankles. Three of them died, and 17 underwent heart surgery.

The newest findings show the drugs "present an unacceptable risk," said FDA Acting Commissioner Dr. Michael Friedman.

Wyeth-Ayerst's Dr. Marc Deitch called the withdrawal "the most prudent course of action." But he said there is still not definitive proof that the drugs are to blame, and said Wyeth-Ayerst will within a few weeks begin studying whether obese people are naturally more prone to valve disease.

Meanwhile, dieters can return unused portions of the drugs for a refund.

Dieters should see their doctors for close heart monitoring, Atkinson said. But not everyone will need an echocardiogram, a sophisticated test that shows heart function and costs between $500 and $1,000, he cautioned.

The FDA said no one knows whether patients' valve leakage will heal once they stop the drugs. But Florida's Bowen said three of his severe patients did heal, and urged dieters not to rush into heart surgery.

The FDA's first warnings in July caused diet prescriptions to plunge, and earlier this month, Florida banned prescriptions of the fen-phen combination, and lawsuits have been filed about the drugs.

Still, Wyeth-Ayerst says 2 million Americans have taken Redux since it hit the market in June 1996, and 4 million have taken Pondimin since 1973, most in recent years. Critics have charged that too many people risked taking the drugs just to lose a few pounds, not because they were truly obese.

Diet and exercise still are the best treatments, said the FDA's Friedman. "These medications have never been by themselves ways of simply and permanently having people lose weight," he said.

But the obese now will have few medical options. Some doctors say phentermine, the other half of fen-phen, works very well on its own while other physicians disagree.

So-called "herbal fen-phen," dietary supplements that contain the chemical ephedrine, are not safe alternatives, Atkinson said — and a pending FDA proposal would ban them.

Council, presidents review new sorority members retreat

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff reporter

Panhellenic Council and K-State sorority presidents reviewed the success of the new sorority members retreat at its meeting Monday night.

The retreat included workshops that gave the members information on the greek system.

Stephanie Bonnell, freshman in music education, said the workshop was informational.

"It really helped me learn what is going on. I really liked learning about public relations and greek life. It was never boring."

Lindsey Roy, junior in advertising and council member, said she was happy with the results of the retreat, and said it was a success.

"I think a lot of good information was given out," she said. "They had everything from self-defense to general information on Homecoming. I've heard a lot of positive things from everyone."

Representatives from the Community Service Program and the Academic Career and Information Center also described their programs at the meeting.

The Career Services department of ACIC wanted the sorority members to be aware of the career opportunities it offers. It can help students with anything from deciding on a major to finding a job.

To help get the information out, the department will present speeches at Wednesday night chapter meetings beginning six weeks from now.

K-State's Community Service Program wants new members to be aware of its programs as well, said Kim Ebben, Community Service Program representative. She said there are programs that allow K-State students to tutor high school and middle school children.

Roy said both speakers presented interesting and useful information.

"We gave the new members a lot of information and a lot to think about," Roy said. "All of the programs are great ways to get involved. We should be set for another great year of activities."

though they may not be specifically asking for someone in their major," he said.

Organizers took an anchored approach to the layout of the Career Fair, similar to that of a mall.

Large companies that draw a lot of students, such as Payless, Walt Disney World and Sprint, are on different levels of the Union.

Henderson suggests students map out the location of the companies they hope to speak with in advance.

Schuley suggested that when students approach a company representative, they need to be confident and prepared.

"Each student needs to have a 30-second commercial: 'This is my name, my major and my interests,'" Schuley said.

Representatives will be speaking with a lot of students, so Schuley recommends spending a maximum of five minutes at each booth.

Students should also remember they might have to wait in line to speak with representatives from certain companies.

It is also important for students to pick up a business card from company representatives.

"I encourage everyone to pick up a business card from the employer. Follow-up letters are a nice, effective way to re-introduce yourself to the employer after the career fair. They create a special interest in the company," Henderson said.

Follow-up letters should be typed and mailed as soon as possible. Henderson said many students go home that evening and type thank-you letters to company representatives.

This is the biggest career fair at K-State to date, with 235 to 240 employers from across the nation.

"I've been here seven years, and invariably what employers say they like about K-State is the work ethic," Schuley said.

"They like the commitment of our students to their work and their seriousness. I think that's an ingredient that we offer in addition to an excellent educational program."

The Rev. Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities, expressed his sympathy for the Newcomb family, who was in attendance.

For closing prayer, Fallon asked guests to join hands and remember the positive ways Newcomb had touched their lives.

ROCK

Drake supported his claim as the sound turned to Southern rock, compliments of the Allman Brothers Band's "Ramblin' Man."

Then came the time of glitter glam theatrical rock. David Bowie summed this sound up the best when he said, "They put the sex back in rock 'n' roll."

Drake then turned his attention to black rock or pop soul. He said that during the '70s Motown started to slip and the sound of Philadelphia took its place with songs such as Stevie Wonder's "Superstition."

Reggae surfaced during the mid-'70s and resurfaced in the late '70s during the British new-wave with the post-punk reggae group, the Police. Punk rock was discussed briefly with emphasis on Blondie and the Sex Pistols. Disco was touched upon with a larger-than-life picture of the Village People flashed upon the screen as "Y.M.C.A." blared through the speakers.

During the late '70s, the faceless bands ruled.

"We never knew what they looked like," Drake said. "They were having an image problem."

After those bands came new wave with the Pretenders, B-52's and the Cars.

"I credit the new wave with putting excitement back in rock 'n' roll," Drake said. He looked up at his audience with a decisive air and announced that's where he was leaving us, on the brink of the '80s, in the '90s, to figure it out for ourselves, or wait until he came back with a lecture on '80s rock.

That's when he stepped off the stage and was converged on by students with questions.

When asked about the '70s, Drake said, "I'm supposed to make sense of a decade that you guys can't remember. It was better than people thought, but weirder than people thought. A lot of people in the '60s didn't learn to play till the '70s."

When asked what was in store for the year 2000, Drake said, "If you grab the charts right now, there's only one trend; singer/songwriters, primarily female."

Drake also had a few comments about '90s rock.

"When a group got big in the '70s, we liked them. We didn't say they were no good. Why do we reject something that's in your face? Something comes out and we like it, but we're beat over the head with it."

When asked about music in general, Drake said, "Whenever there's no heart in the music, no one cares about it. That's why no one cares about Rush." In response to that, one student grabbed his chest and staggered back shouting, "That hurts!"

He also announced that grunge was over three years ago and, among sighs of relief, someone shouted, "Thank God!"

THE GOOD, THE BAD AND THE UGLY

Lecture at Forum Hall examines '70s rock

LESLEY BAKER
staff reporter

The lights dimmed in Forum Hall and the handful of students sprawled in their chairs were shown the 1970s as more than a decade of the Vietnam War or Nixon and Watergate. They were shown the 1970s as a decade of musical revolution.

Barry Drake, hailed as the walking encyclopedia of music, a performer and songwriter, gave a multimedia presentation titled " '70s Rock — The Good, The Bad and The Ugly" on Monday night.

Drake traced the late '60s and early '70s with the Beatles break-up and the members' various solos, playing recordings of John Lennon's "Imagine," George Harrison's "My Sweet Lord," and Ringo Starr's "It Don't Come Easy," as sounds of that time.

Hard rock "is blues-based music just played louder and heavier up on stage," Drake said. He then proceeded to mutate the Beatles' easy sounds into the jarring notes of the Rolling Stones' "Brown Sugar" and the Who's "Won't Get Fooled Again" which, he commented, was about political disillusionment.

The lecture spanned the arrival of American roots rock with the sounds of the Grateful Dead's "Truckin'," Credence Clearwater Revival's "Lookin' Out My Back Door," and the Band's "Up on Cripple Creek." Then

Admissions director retires after 31 years; interim director named

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff reporter

Richard Elkins, director of admissions for the past 31 years, is retiring this month. Until a permanent director is found, Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, will take on the additional duties as director of admissions.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said a national search is being conducted to fill the admissions director position. The screening committee decided to reopen the search so a broader applicant pool could be attracted.

In the next few weeks, the admissions office will advertise in higher education publications in hopes of attracting that broader pool, Bosco said.

Moeder was asked to take on the admissions post until a permanent director could be found. Bosco said he is confident Moeder can effectively take on these additional responsibilities.

"I look at this challenge as a unique opportunity to learn how to improve our direct services to families and students and possibly gain a distinct advantage in our ability to attract and retain students," Bosco said.

In addition to his responsibilities, which include the administration of student aid as director of student financial aid, Moeder will also be in charge of supervising the admission process, reviewing applications for admission and residency, and meeting prospective students.

Moeder said he views this as an opportunity to help students in one location. A prospective student has three areas of concern about school: admission, financial aid and housing. He said finances is the No. 1 reason students do not attend K-State.

"This is an excellent opportunity for the financial aid department and admissions to see how each office can positively impact students and families," Moeder said.

Moeder started working at K-State with a job as a student employee in the student financial aid office in 1973.

He was promoted to coordinator of veterans affairs in 1977, assistant director of student financial assistance in 1981 and associate director in 1986. He has been the director since 1991.

Moeder said it is a wonderful opportunity to stay at K-State, and he enjoys interacting with students on a daily basis.

Through his experience at K-State, Moeder said his overall goal has been to make higher education at K-State an opportunity for all students.

OLIVIA COLLINS, FACULTY MEMBER

Opportunity Fair gives students chance to build character, résumés for future

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

Students looking to build character or make positive additions to their resumes should look no further.

The 1997 Opportunity Fair: Professional Development Through Service will provide students and faculty with a chance to learn more about community service organizations in the Manhattan area.

"Unlike the Career Fair, our focus is on volunteer internships, cooperative education and community service," said Olivia Collins, faculty member and coordinator for the School of Family Studies and Human Services.

This is the third year for the Opportunity Fair at K-State. The fair is sponsored by Career and Employment Services and the College of Human Ecology, and it is coordinated by Family Studies and Human Services. Students can attend the fair from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Wednesday in the Union courtyard and first-floor concourse.

"We know that many employers see community service and involvement as a key perspective to hiring," Collins said. "That's one of the reasons we began the Opportunity Fair."

Building a connection between the campus and the Manhattan community is another reason for the fair.

"It is a great way for the agencies to get exposure to the students," said Ailleen Cray, executive director of United Way in Riley County. "I think a lot of students stay within the microsphere of the university and don't get out as much as they would like."

Making students aware that community service is important is also a reason the fair was introduced.

"It's very helpful because all employers are looking for people who are self-directed, motivated and care about other people," said Michele Hafer, senior in family life and community services and student coordinator of the Opportunity Fair.

Hafer said she attended the Opportunity Fair last year and focused on finding information about the opportunities available in Manhattan.

"It can lead to job opportunities for anyone," Hafer said. She completed her internship last spring with Sunset Zoological Park and was able to gain a part-time job with the zoo this semester as the education assistant.

This year, there will be 42 participating agencies and organizations at the fair. Students will be given a list of participants that will include the name of the organization, contact person and phone number.

"It's a good number of participants because it gives students a good sense of what is available, and it's contained enough so students can visit each organization they want to," Collins said.

Collins encourages students to be prepared to spend time talking with organizations that interest them. The agencies will also provide detailed job descriptions and handouts on their organization.

"There will be a lot of interaction," Collins said. "The representatives really like to talk with the students."

Among those encouraged to come are students interested in law, working with their hands or those who wouldn't necessarily think of volunteering. There are opportunities for anything people are interested in, Hafer said.

"It is a good way to get involved," Cray said. "A lot of students don't know that there are so many volunteer agencies out there."

After about 500 students visited last year, Collins hopes to see an increase in attendance.

"We are really hoping for more students," Collins said. "Our agency participation has increased each year. They always like to see more students. It's relatively new on campus, and they know it takes time for the word to get out there."

More info?
A participant list for the 1997 Opportunity Fair can be found at www.ksu.edu/ces.

The new location of the fair this year plans to be a direct link to increasing student attendance. This will increase the visibility and attendance through passing traffic, Collins said. The fair has been in the Union Ballroom in the past.

The fair is not just for individual opportunities.

Many participating agencies are also looking for volunteer groups, such as housing groups, sororities, fraternities and student-interest groups, Collins said.

Students should take business cards and résumés to hand out, Collins said.

"The important thing is to go, visit and learn," Collins said.

Fraternity cleans section of I-70 for community service project

LANCE SCHOEN
staff reporter

For the men of FarmHouse, doing a community service project is not just a time to give back to the community, but it is also a time for brotherhood.

Saturday, 48 members of FarmHouse and their housemother cleaned a section of Interstate 70 between mile markers 335 and 337. It took them about 30 minutes. Ben Janssen, FarmHouse community service chairman, was pleased with the turnout.

"You never know how many guys are going to get up and go," Janssen said.

After the cleanup was done, the brothers went to the Dairy Queen on I-70 to unwind and have some brotherhood time, which is a tradition.

Janssen said the cleanup crew has found some strange things in the ditches in the past few years.

"Over the years, we have found many interesting magazines," he said. "This year, somebody found a dead dog."

FarmHouse cleans the interstate once a semester and recently renewed its contract with the Kansas Department of Transportation for another three years.

Living suites offer apartment-style housing

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

A student who wants to live in an apartment and keep the perks of a residence hall might consider the newly constructed living suites in Boyd Hall.

This summer, Boyd's basement was remodeled to create six living suites in a former study room.

Four suites are separated from the other two. These four rooms, commonly referred to as the cluster suite, share a main living area with couches and a fireplace.

The rooms of the cluster suite vary in size. There are two single rooms, one two-person room and one two- to three-person room. These suites share two bathrooms, one of which is handicap-accessible.

"It provides apartment-style housing for five to nine women," said Jennifer Bouchard, assistant resident life coordinator.

All rooms in the cluster suite have sinks, medicine cabinets, closets, ceiling fans and Internet access.

Outside the cluster suite, there are two additional two- to three-person accommodations. These suites have similar features but have their own bathrooms within them.

"We like having a sink in our room as opposed to sharing a communal bathroom," said Barbra Henderson, sophomore in communication sciences and disorders.

The residents are pleased with the new suites.

"I could not be happier," said Nicole Twigg, freshman in chemical engineering. "It's like our own little world."

Teri Ward, sophomore in architecture, said she liked the suites because of the accessibility to residence hall services and increased space.

"We can have more people over and be more hospitable because we have a bigger place," said Mia Fraydouni, junior in family studies and community service.

Suite residents said there were no disadvantages to living in the basement suites, just differences.

"It's secluded from the rest of the hall, but your friends can still come and visit you," said Neeley Bathurst, freshman in elementary education and business.

The residents did not view cost as a disadvantage. The suites are around $80 more each semester than an unrenovated room in Boyd.

"It's really not that much more. It's definitely worth it," Henderson said.

Bouchard said many students did not know about the suites because this is the first year they have been available. Several previous Boyd Hall residents signed up for the rooms through early room-preferencing. She thinks interest in the suites will grow as more people see and hear about them.

"There'll be a good demand for them next year," Bouchard said.

Career Fair showcases students, companies

Hundreds of students crammed into the K-State Student Union, slowly making their way from booth to booth. The goal: to network and find a job.

For many students the Career Fair, sponsored by Career and Employment Services on Tuesday in the Union, was the perfect starting point for their job search.

The Career Fair showcased 238 companies with 249 booths on three levels of the Union. This is about 20 percent larger than last year's Career Fair.

"I think that students are more prepared this year. We've had really positive comments about their résumés, their professional dress and how they are presenting themselves," said Marcia Schuley, associate director of Career and Employment Services and chairwoman of the Career Fair Committee.

Many of the companies attending the Career Fair were also impressed with this year's student candidates.

"We love their work ethic. They've got that critical thinking ability. They're fun to be around, too," said Karen Meenen, manager of executive recruitment for Payless Shoe Source.

Qualities such as leadership roles and foreign-language skills were also highly valued this year.

"You've got a great language program here. We're looking for those candidates that can speak foreign languages. Right now, your critical languages include Spanish, Arabic, Vietnamese, Chinese and Japanese," Parnell Miles Jr., special agent recruiter for the FBI, said.

K-State student representatives from the Walt Disney World College Program were also impressed by the applicants.

"We've definitely seen a lot of quality people and a lot of young people interested in internships," said Jenny Palmer, senior in journalism and mass communications, and hotel and restaurant management.

In order for the Career Fair to run smoothly, student volunteers began arriving at 6 a.m. to help direct company representatives to their booths and run shuttle buses.

Dawn Bicknell, junior in apparel and textile marketing, worked as a student volunteer from noon to 3 p.m.

"I tell people what they need to do, where to go and answer their questions," she said.

The work of the 150 student volunteers did not go unnoticed.

"I really want to compliment the 150 student volunteers. Many of them were here at 6 a.m. We just couldn't do it without them," Schuley said.

Assistance also came from members of the Career Fair Committee, which consists of representatives from each college.

"I really want to commend our committee, who have just been the heart and soul to make this happen," Schuley said.

City Hall employees relocate to new office

JENNI EVANS
staff reporter

City employees will relocate to new office space beginning Oct. 4.

The City Commission approved in a unanimous vote Tuesday evening to go ahead with the proposed renovation and expansion of City Hall.

"We're all going to need to find ways to support and sacrifice for this," Mayor Bruce Snead said.

Employees will be moved on Oct. 4 and 5 from 1101 Poyntz Ave. to the Fire Station Headquarters building at 2000 Denison Ave. and a vacant space in Manhattan Town Center.

Offices of the city manager, city clerk, community development, public works and part of information services will relocate to the Large Assembly Room and the Small Training Room within the Fire Station Headquarters.

Finance, human resources and the rest of the information services will be moved to a vacant space in the mall. The space is directly north of the Sears store.

The utilities department administrative staff will move to office space at the Wastewater Treatment Plant.

Fire Department personnel and equipment will work out of a mobile home at the Public Works Maintenance Facilities.

Employees will be at these temporary office spaces for about 15 months while City Hall undergoes renovations.

In other business, Steve French, Special Alcohol Funds Advisory Committee chairman, proposed the allocation of the Special Alcohol Fund for 1998.

"The majority of these funds are used to reach young people," French said.

Nine programs were allocated a sum of $181,980.

One of these programs is UFM. This program focuses on the use of K-State students majoring in education, social services and criminal justice. Students will serve as mentors for children who might be too old for such organizations as Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc., and the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan.

A resolution was also approved to create a benefit district to finance improvements for the south section of Browning Avenue.

K-State owns the property on the east side of Browning Avenue and uses it for agricultural research.

Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 and K-State will each pay for 15 percent of the overall cost.

It was also approved 4-0 that the City Commission authorize city administration to solicit proposals for the repair or demolition of 327 Poyntz Ave. This is the former site of Hayes House of Music.

Listserv members receive explicit e-mail, porn files

TRAVIS D. LENKNER

Privilege Fee Committee Chair Aaron Otto, Student Body President Tim Riemann, and President Jon Wefald were all named in a sexually explicit e-mail that was sent to at least 450 residence hall computer users Tuesday night on the university network.

Otto's name was listed as the sender.

Otto said he did not send the message, which made several graphic sexual references to Otto and Amy Knedlik, his running mate in last year's student body presidential election.

"I want everybody to know that I did not send this e-mail, and I can point out several reasons why I know I didn't," he said.

The mail also made a sexual reference to Riemann and made sexual and religious references to "President Wefald's administration." Three pornographic images were attached to the file.

It was sent at 8:48 p.m. Tuesday on the residence hall ethernet listserv, a mass-mailing address that connects computer users who have ethernet connections.

Otto apologized to those who were named in the mailing.

"I apologize for the people who are mentioned in here. I consider President Wefald a good friend of mine. Amy Knedlik is also a very good friend ... President Riemann and I have been friends since he was a freshman and I was a sophomore here at K-State. The elec-

COLBERT HILLS

Golf course to offer research, education

AT A GLANCE

Colbert Hill golf course is well under way, and if construction continues as planned the course should be ready by 1999.

senior staff writer

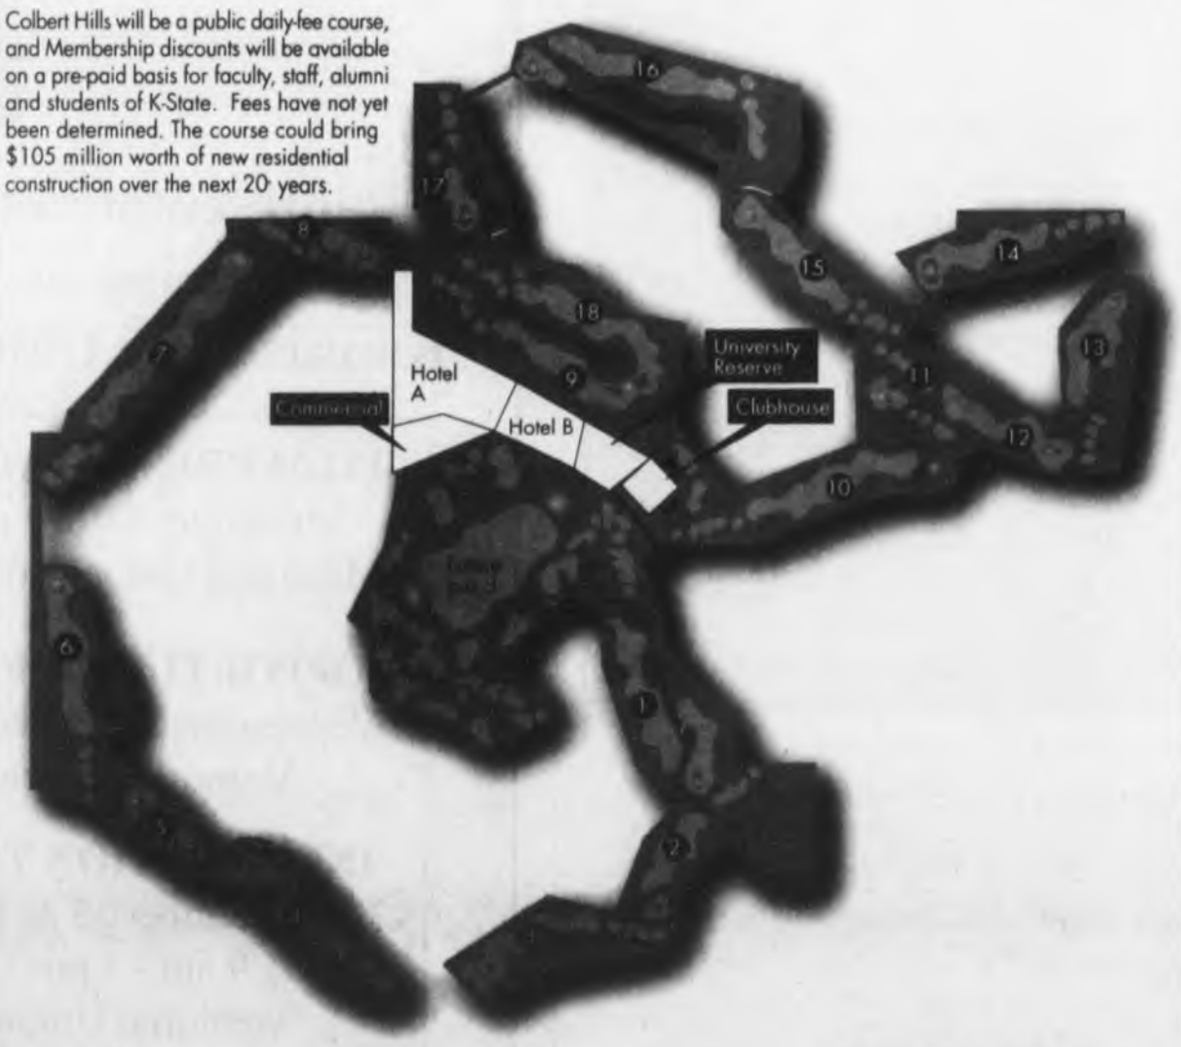
The university wouldn't have seriously considered a golf course on campus had it not been for Jim Colbert, said Bob Krause, K-State vice president for institutional advancement.

"It really starts with Jim," Krause said. "We wouldn't be interested in the project if Jim and the PGA Tour and the Golf Course Superintendents' Association of America weren't involved."

Colbert, a 1964 alumnus of K-State and a PGA Senior Tour player, began surveying the area around Manhattan in spring 1994, Krause said.

More than three years later, the area chosen for what will become Colbert Hills Golf Course was recommended for rezoning in July by the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board. The project is well under way for redevelopment as K-State's own golf course.

"It's going well," Krause said. "We've got about $6 million committed, and we're just now getting involved with the PGA Tour. I hope that by February or March we can get it annexed, and maybe by this fall we'll have some preliminary ground-turning."



The area, which is about 1,000 acres of Kansas prairie, was used primarily for grazing by former owner Jack Vanier and his family. It is just outside the Manhattan city limits, northwest of Kimball Avenue.

If all goes according to plan, by 1999 there will be a club house, a driving range, a nine-hole par three training course and a championship 18-hole

Colbert Hills will be a public daily-fee course, and Membership discounts will be available on a pre-paid basis for faculty, staff, alumni and students of K-State. Fees have not yet been determined. The course could bring $105 million worth of new residential construction over the next 20 years.

Professor against proposed course

senior staff writer

While the Colbert Hills project may be going down as the first golf course in history with a contingent of scientists monitoring its progress from the beginning, one K-State professor thinks the whole deal stinks.

"The majority of people in the area see this whole project as an improvement, which is what bothers me," said Tim Keane, associate professor of landscape architecture. "I see it as a detriment."

> In certain areas of this country, you'd kill to have 1,000 acres of prairie. Here nobody seems to have a problem with treating it like trash.

> associate professor of landscape architecture

When Keane isn't teaching or researching architecture, he likes to hunt and fish on Kansas prairies such as the area north of Kimball Avenue and west of Seth Childs Road, outside the Manhattan city limits.

He said he isn't a golfer, and doesn't have much personal use for a golf course. He prefers the natural landscape of Kansas prairie for more than just looks.

Natural prairie is vanishing in North America, and Kansas is about the only place that has a significant amount left, he said. Keane believes that since there's so much of it around, local residents take it for granted.

"In certain areas of this country, you'd kill to have 1,000 acres of prairie," he said. "Here nobody seems to have a problem with treating it like trash."

Bob Krause, university vice president for institutional and academic advancement, said that in the past 11 years, four housing developments have appeared on

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
DIGEST
WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1997

NEWSrewind
News Rewind collects the top campus, local, state, national and world news from the past 48 hours. Briefs are collected from wire and staff reports.

Anti-crime organization members charged with grand theft

CLEVELAND — A city employee inadvertently punched in a 4 instead of a 1, and $617,597 wound up in the account of an anti-crime group.

What happened next, prosecutors say, was itself a crime: Members of the organization converted the money into checks for four of them and spent a chunk of it, even though they say they didn't know where the money came from.

Now, two leaders of the organization devoted to fighting black-on-black crime have been charged with grand theft. And Mayor Michael White, facing a primary Sept. 30, has suspended seven city employees, including his finance director.

Art McKoy, founder of Black on Black Crime Inc., and chairman Abdul Rahim Ali Hasan could get up to five years in jail if convicted.

The men insist that their bank told them the deposit was legitimate and that they thought it might have come from a grant they had applied for or from an anonymous benefactor.

They won't say how they spent the money — nor will prosecutors — but in the past week, the men have returned $146,600 — and a 1991 Mercedes.

The trouble started March 31, when a data operator made the typo on a city voucher, sending a utility payment intended for Cinergy Services Inc. to Black on Black, which received a mere $7,000 from the city last year.

The April 1 wire transfer wasn't caught until August because the city was behind on balancing its books. It took five more weeks for employees to track the money and notify White.

Virginia woman beaten to death by roommates, other woman

RICHMOND, Va. — A young woman was bludgeoned to death by her three roommates and another woman, apparently for disrupting the household by starting a romance with one of them, investigators say.

The body of Stacey Hanna, 19, was found face down in the mud July 27 in the woods. She had been beaten beyond recognition, her throat slashed and her skull fractured.

The other women were involved romantically with one another, and Hanna, who had moved to Lynchburg from Richmond only three weeks earlier, might have become intimate with at least one of them, investigators said.

The women believed Hanna "was interfering in their relationships and had told lies to them," Chesterfield County Detective Dave Zeheb testified at a pretrial hearing Monday.

Hanna's roommates — Domica Winkler, 18, Tracy Bitner, 19, and Kelly Tibbs, 18 — were indicted Monday on charges of capital murder, abduction and robbery. Stephanie Cull, 18, was charged with murder and abduction.

Winkler, accused of throwing a cinder block at Hanna, told investigators that "there are times when people need to die, and this is one of those times," Detective Rick Mormando testified.

Hanna was taken out for what she thought would be some beer-drinking in the woods. The women planned just to beat her but began to worry she would go to police, so they killed her, Zeheb said.

Diana's story could be portrayed in upcoming Broadway musical

NEW YORK — Princess Diana's fairy-tale life and real-world death captured the hearts of millions. The combination is brilliant for Broadway, theater insiders said.

"She's the classic tragic heroine," Aaron Frankel, a Broadway director who teaches musical theater at the New School, told the New York Post on Tuesday. "She was beautiful, she was good and she was flawed."

Composer Jonathan Segal said he has put some initial concepts together for a show about Diana's life and death. "It's a fabulous story for a musical."

Several other cultural icons have been immortalized on the Great White Way. Eva Peron and opera diva Maria Callas both were the subject of popular shows, and a Broadway play opens next month on the life of Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis.

The princess's Aug. 31 death set off an outpouring of grief around the world, with millions of mourners crowding London for her funeral. Diana, 36, died in a Paris car crash with her boyfriend, millionaire Dodi Fayed.

Elton John's tribute to the princess, performed at her funeral ceremony, has turned into a huge hit, with all the proceeds going to the Diana, Princess of Wales, Memorial Fund.

Stovall argues river water rights, Kansas may sue Nebraska

TOPEKA — Attorney General Carla Stovall will tell the Legislature next month whether she thinks Kansas should sue Nebraska for allegedly taking more than its share of water from the Republican River.

Stovall said she will decide the feasibility of a lawsuit and make a recommendation to the Legislature's interim Committee on Energy and Natural Resources on Oct. 5.

Kansas contends Nebraska has violated terms of a 1960 compact between the two states.

Stovall said Nebraska has failed to take meaningful regulatory action to enforce the compact in its own state, and the two states reached impasse in 1995 over resolving their differences. Subsequent attempts to mediate the dispute also failed, and all negotiations broke off last March.

New garden is flowering, expanding

▸ HORTICULTURE CLUB HAS helped with campus beautification project

ASHLEY YOULE
staff reporter

K-State's botanical garden is blooming. The garden is under construction in the first of four phases.

Breaking ground last September, the $11 million to $12 million project will feature 12 acres of plants, flowers and fountains north of the intersection of Denison Avenue and McCain Lane.

In addition to these 12 acres, an existing rose garden stretches two acres between the green house and the conservatory.

Two years ago, the visitors' center received a new roof and a new fire escape, and students in the Construction Science Club volunteered their time to gut the building. Money is being raised to finish the interior of the building.

This March, workers will start adding to the underground drainage system. Rainbird, a large irrigation company, has donated irrigation materials like sprinkler heads. It has also helped with the installation.

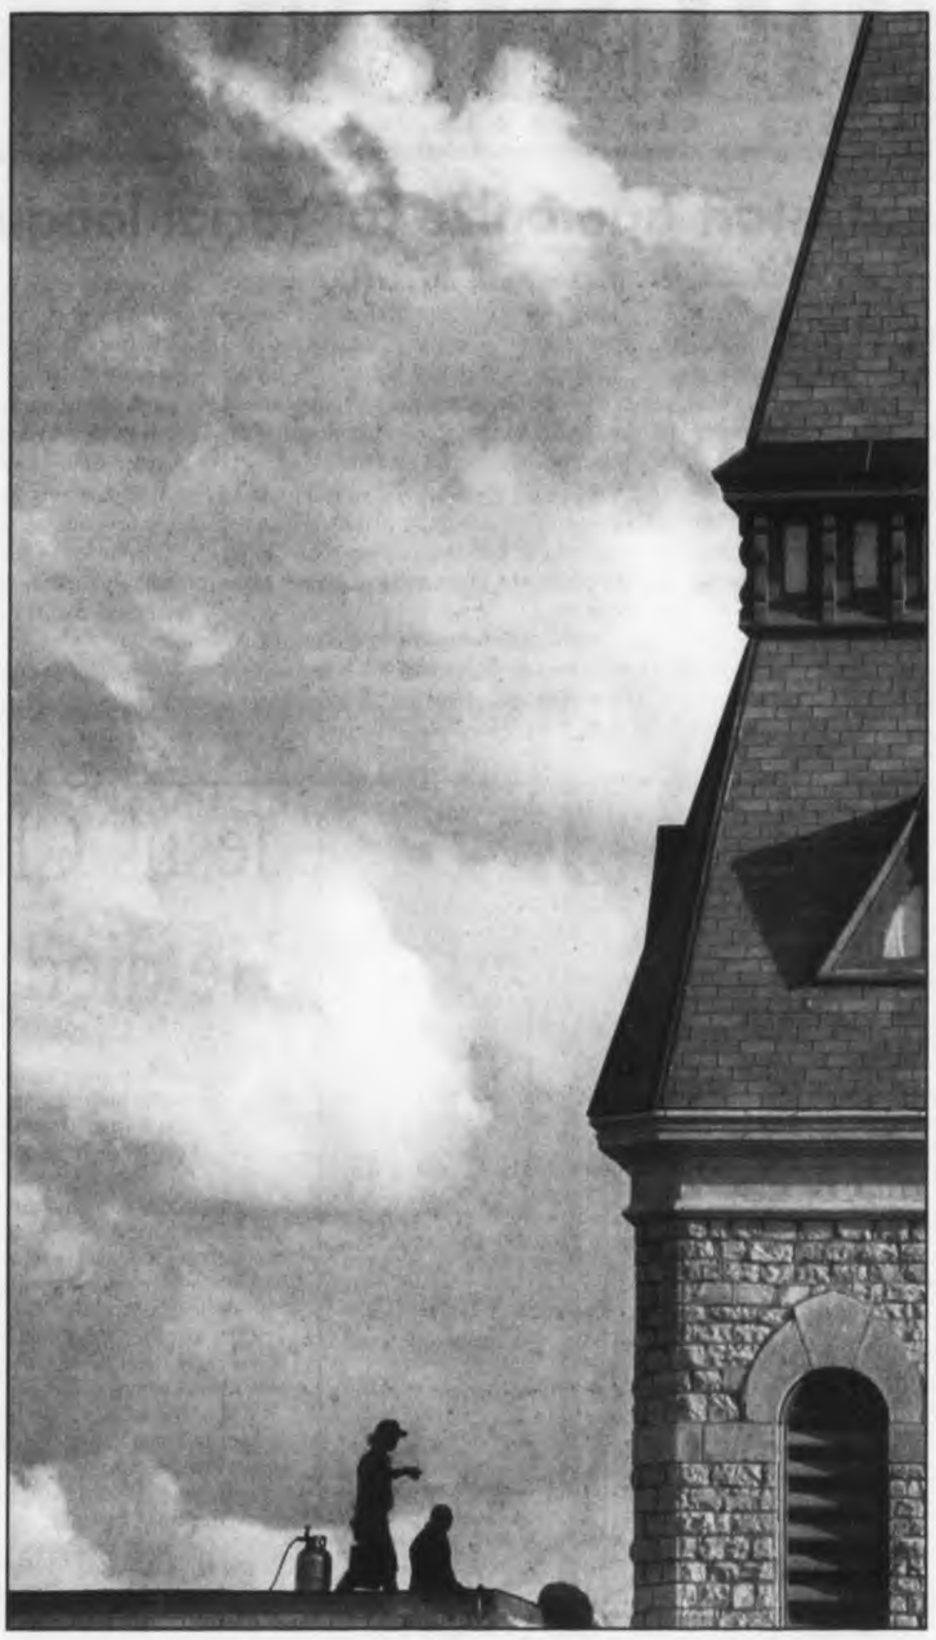
"We see this garden as a great teaching place for students," said Alice Le Duc, acting director of the garden.

Students will not only use the garden, but they are also volunteering their time to maintain it.

The Horticulture Club has helped out with many projects, and students have the opportunity to help out in lab by installing the underground storm drain.

"I think the expansion of the garden is good because it's showing the public more of what we do as horticulture students," Anne Jones, sophomore in horticulture, said.

Le Duc said the project will include scholarship and internship opportunities. She encourages students to apply for them.



Most of the money raised for this project is coming from private donations, but many people have donated plants and flowers. Every dollar raised for the garden will be matched by $2 to keep the garden going in the future, Le Duc said.

"We would like to raise enough money to have an area outdoors for events such as wedding receptions and reunions," Le Duc said. "We also want to build a small amphitheater for all visitors to come enjoy."

Darcy Davidson, senior in criminology and pre-law, said she is excited to see the garden expand.

"K-State has such a beautiful campus. The garden will not only be a nice addition to the campus, but to Manhattan as well," she said.

The garden is open from dawn until dusk seven days a week.

New coordinator plans student trips

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Jerrilynn Romano's life of traveling and working in different countries has prepared her for her new position as coordinator for Group Study Abroad.

Group Study Abroad organizes international tours with specific themes for students. The office arranges the travel details and gets the courses approved for college credit.

"All the details are handled by me, including getting the credits approved by the Board of Regents and marketing it," Romano said.

Romano said her basic role is to act as a contact point for professors interested in leading short-term trips abroad.

The tours are designed as packages. The cost includes tuition, travel arrangements, lodging, guides and food.

"We try to price them as affordably as we can," she said.

Romano is not a stranger to international experience. She has lived and worked in four countries outside the United States. She is also married to a German native.

Her international experience began when she was 18. She took a year off from school to travel abroad. After that, she never wanted to stop.

"That changed my whole perspective on everything in the world," Romano said. "Going abroad is a transforming experience."

Even though her job is a part-time position, Romano said it keeps her busy.

"It's a lot of work for 20 hours a week," she said. "I hope my enthusiasm is enough to get everything done. I try my hardest."

College is the best time for people to travel abroad, Romano said. Students have more time and fewer daily obligations than most people in the work force. They are also more likely to continue traveling later in life.

"You kind of get hooked," Romano said.

Romano said her door is always open to professors who have ideas for trips abroad. She also works with individual students interested in traveling.

"It's a two-way process. I'm open to any feedback and suggestions."

Freshman students learn about bad checks, alcohol

LANCE SCHOEN
staff reporter

Freshmen got a lesson in bad behavior — and its consequences — from the county attorney on Thursday.

Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy spoke to a freshman orientation class about the legal stumbling blocks students often run into.

Judy Lynch, who teaches the class, said Kennedy has been speaking to her class for the past six or seven years.

"I like to bring him in early in the semester to talk about the consequences of misbehaving," Lynch said.

Kennedy's biggest emphasis was on alcohol and the problems it can cause if it is not used in a responsible manner.

Tickets given to minors for possession, having an open container and driving under the influence can not only be expensive, but can also hinder people when they are looking for jobs, he said.

Kennedy said problems arise when people are issued tickets. Often, they will try to avoid the law or the consequences.

"You might as well take your medicine and get it over with," he said. "Those officers have radios and are networked with each other, the campus police and the Riley County police."

The fine for most alcohol-related tickets is between $200 for a minor in possession to $1,500 for a DUI, including lawyer fees.

Writing bad checks is another problem in Manhattan. Kennedy said that the merchants of Riley County have asked him to

Collegian editorial board, staff apologize for racial language

Dear Collegian Readers:

In Friday's edition of the Collegian, a racial epithet appeared in a story referring to an outstanding faculty member's work with multi-cultural students.

The editorial board, the reporter and the Collegian staff apologize for this mistake.

The Collegian staff is embarrassed and heart-sick that the term "people of color" was shortened to "colored" and that the mistake was not corrected before it was printed in the newspaper.

We are a staff of students learning to be better journalists and people. It is incorrect to infer that this mistake implies racism on the part of the Collegian or anyone associated with the newspaper.

It was a mistake — a horrible mistake, but an honest mistake. However, being human is not an excuse.

In an integrated society, we occasionally forget the pain of words used to segregate and limit a group of people based on their race or cultural background. These words are still a part of people's lives and collective consciousness, and it's a history that should not be forgotten.

We take responsibility for this serious error and in doing so, we want to move forward.

We have increased coverage of minority issues, events and involvement in recent years and pledge to improve the quality and frequency of this coverage throughout this semester.

We believe every student on this campus contributes to the quality of the education and experience of attending K-State. We believe every voice has extraordinary value and should be heard. Diversity means more strengths, talents and perspectives to learn from.

Racism is ignorance, and we don't want to be a part of any activity which hurts, alienates or segregates an individual or group of people. We want to be part of the solution, not part of the problem.

We appreciate the students, staff and faculty members who have reached out this week to educate and inform the staff. Our constituency includes every person who reads the Collegian, and we appreciate your patience, intelligence and feedback.

We want to know when we cover the issues and events that matter to you and when, like in Friday's edition, we fail.

The Collegian ran a correction on page 2 in Monday's edition. Today, partially because studies have shown our Wednesday readership is the highest, we offer an apology.

The students who work on the Collegian are continuing to learn from this mistake and will continue to discuss issues of concern to all students.

We cannot erase the mistake in Friday's edition or ever make it right. We hope, though, that this is a start.

Clean, honest living is almost too much to ask of anyone, even more so in college. We spend much of our time trying to avoid any shred of reality. And there's no need for the parental guilt-trip cast over our less-than-professional decisions. No, we merely react to the extremes around us.

The most glaring extreme is the constant quality of idealism found in our education. Basic scientific study is nearly always based on ideal conditions with scant mention of pesky real-world factors. This would complicate the problem inordinately. Of course, there are those classes with the sole purpose of exposing the non-ideal. But we'll forget those for now and only consider the ideal situation.

So when students amuse themselves with the typical weekend pursuits of hedonism, we must forgive. Surrounded by the academic idealism of leisurely study and analysis, students are driven into less-than-ideal lifestyles.

Why is it when many students become professionals, they slowly whither, pardon my older readers, into conservatives whose sole wish is to achieve a level of ideal suburban/urban dwelling they've secretly wished for since high school? Where is the point when some of us give up our counter-culture interests (not to sound trite, by any means)?

One could argue it happens with marriage, children and the increasing need for safety and comfort. Perhaps. What, then, about those who don't marry or raise children?

One could also say many K-State students never developed a well-placed sense of idealism and a good dose of cynicism. The materialistic culture that dominates all campus life seems to deny us cynics.

When a great deal of us came to terms with materialism in high school in favor of restraint, the majority of us only bought further into the dominant culture. It's no accident the uninspired Tommy Hilfiger label has set record profits — its call letters have become the signifier of a whole neo-Yuppie movement within my generation — the street Yuppie, or "struppie."

Witness Calvin Klein's effective advertising campaign for his relatively indistinguishable fragrances. Here's a Wall Street darling, someone who sold out any shred of credibility as a designer decades ago, pushing hip culture in your face to sell cheap cologne. And, come to believe, he's just shocked (shocked!) at the mainstream audiences who buy his garbage. Oh me, oh my.

Why reject materialism when you can embrace it while simultaneously keeping an ersatz embrace of hip street culture? Not only does this choice reinforce one's membership into the Future Country Clubbers of America, it also serves to advertise one's level of faux cynicism, which just happens to be trendy at the moment.

The side effect to this phenomenon is the marginalization of the real street culture and those who attempt to eke out a real existence.

My idealism's constant barrage of real, negative test cases serves to heighten my cynicism (a scary thought because I have yet to hit that mid-life pang of what-is-my-life-about cynicism). I'm an idealist, therefore cynical.

Our generational materialism is mainly rooted in consumerism, which is either a reflection of interests and/or upbringing. We struggle to grow independent of our parents only to become them, more or less. This generation doesn't have the defining event, such as World War II, to fuel great shifts in generational cultures.

Perhaps this argument exaggerates the situation too much. After all, the real argument reduces to a pro-bohemian stance against the mainstream, which is an age-old topic of conversation. The idealists of the world have always provided a fringe to the greater society.

When one of those idealists reaches an ideal point, the greater society recognizes it as such, latches onto the ideal and muddles it into the mass culture of materialism (i.e. the same reason you can find a Monet painting on placemats, dishes, mouse pads, etc.).

Which brings the argument full circle — how does a cynic survive in the world of ideal consumption to lead a legitimate life? How does one keep from joining the game of materialism without sacrificing a good quality of life?

Just be.

Jesus Christ scarred, but He died for all our sins

The boy looked in the mirror helplessly. No matter how long he stared, the ugly scar would not disappear. Like a scarlet letter, it branded him unclean.

Grim-faced doctors had whispered about him for days. Finally, one had gathered the courage to go into his room and give him the news.

"The scar is permanent."

Over and over, the words echoed in his mind, until he would scream with the insanity of it all.

Before the accident, the boy had been handsome. Now he was a scourge on the name of his family — so ugly small children cringed and often cried when he walked past.

The Golden Boy was gone.

The Beast had come.

There was no hope.

The boy would die.

He no longer wanted to live.

One day, another young boy came to the town. He called himself Joe, and no one knew for sure where he had come from. He was as handsome as the scarred boy had been, and his face radiated a happiness like the people had never seen. Joe quickly became a town favorite.

When Joe heard of the scarred boy's plight, he was deeply troubled. He went to visit him at the Home immediately. The Home was a place where people could be sent because of what was deemed a "frightful" appearance. No one ugly was allowed in the town. The boy had been there for weeks ... or had it been months? He was not sure.

Once someone was sent to the Home, they never returned. No one went there to visit. But Joe went.

The boy was not pleased when Joe arrived. In Joe, the boy saw all that he had been and all that he could have become. Joe had spoken with the boy for only a few moments when the boy became enraged. He leapt at Joe with the ferocity of a cornered animal.

Joe left without saying anything more.

However, in his mind there was a plan being formed. He would help this boy. Joe would take his scar.

He had heard of a rare procedure in which skin from the same part of another person's body could be grafted over what had been thought a "permanent" scar. This would cause the graft donor to bear the scar and the person who received the graft to be as clear-skinned as before they received the scar.

It had never been done. Not because of danger, but because no one would think of taking another person's scar. What would be the point?

Joe decided that he would be the first to try it. Not only would he try it for the boy he had met, but he would do it for everyone in the Home.

He would empty the Home.

One by one, over the weeks, Joe met with each resident of the Home. He met with the directors and all the doctors involved. It was determined that the surgeries would be done consecutively over the course of a week.

As the Week approached, the residents of the Home grew restless. Could it possibly be true? Some had spent many weeks and months in the Home. Some had spent years. Others had been here their whole lives. Many were excited. Some were cynical. Others who knew no other life found it simply too hard to believe. But the day came. Joe came to the hospital wing of the Home. For one week he underwent surgery after painful surgery. Finally, Joe had no more of his perfect, smooth skin. All of the residents of the Home were free to leave. They headed back to the town, joyful in their restored natures. They told everyone what had happened.

Joe was left a mass of scars. He was uglier than anything anyone had ever seen. But the happiness in his heart remained.

For many days, Joe did not go back to the town he loved so much. Many forgot Joe. One dark Thursday night, Joe returned to the town. Because of his ugliness, he was quickly singled out.

No one ugly was allowed in the town.

Joe tried to explain that he had come back on a mission of love. He just wished to give everyone the joy and happiness that he felt in his own heart. They would not listen. In their disgust, they mocked him. This could not be beautiful Joe. This ugly specimen must be put to death. The next morning, as the ones who had been freed from the Home looked on, Joe was beaten and bloodied. He was hung up for all to see.

As he died, he wept for the people he had loved so much.

His people.

The ones who had killed him.

We are those people.

Article shows ignorance; racist term not tolerated

Editor,

I am writing to applaud Sara Burdette's profile of Tamara Abdulhaqq (Sept. 12). Abdulhaqq came across as a competent, young professional who has retained her enthusiasm for hard work and achievement beyond graduation.

Such positive direction and enthusiastic effort for K-Staters, past and present, by a recent graduate does indeed deserve applause.

Sadly, Burdette herself does not come across so well. It saddens me to see, yet again, an example of ignorance when it comes to matters of diverse people on campus. When Burdette used the term "colored students," she was surely writing out of ignorance.

But ignorance does not legitimize the racially offensive phrase. Such a phrase in this country, resurrects the ghost of Jim Crow and makes all of us who are huddled under the umbrella of "students of color" shiver with ghastly recognition.

Education is the only sincere apology that can be offered for racial ignorance.

Article informs, but words offensive to BSU, others

Editor,

The Black Student Union recognizes the efforts of the Collegian to include under-represented organizations in the paper. The articles were informative and have increased the popularity of BSU. Sometimes, there have been mistakes not worth mentioning. However, in the Sept. 12 article, "Two jobs keep new adviser busy," an error occurred that cannot be overlooked.

The writer's reference to students as "colored students" will not be tolerated by BSU, nor by any African-American on this campus. This derogatory phrase should've become extinct more than 30 years ago. The ignorance of the writer and the Collegian editors will not be accepted by BSU. We'd like to remind you of the previous conditions in which African-Americans lived as "colored."

This weekend, African-American alumni, who graduated as far back as 1923, were present on this campus, and it was an embarrassment to have them read the article.

These alumni came to Kansas as trailblazers, creating a path for African-Americans to follow. They obtained degrees in a time when African-Americans were forced to use separate drinking fountains and restrooms marked "colored." They were forced to live in the "colored" section of town.

These alumni fought to end race discrimination in schools. African-Americans fought hard to have the word "colored" removed from this country's vocabulary. When Jim Crow died, so did "colored," and that's where it will stay.

BSU encourages everyone to learn and remember the history of this country. If we fail to, we are doomed to repeat it. BSU is prepared to ensure that second-class citizenship will not be repeated, by any means necessary.

Cohen-Esrey not over, Commission to discuss it

Editor,

I'd like to take this opportunity to thank all of the concerned citizens who voiced their opposition, either in person or by writing letters to the editor, to the planned unit development proposed in the Northview Area by Cohen-Esrey.

However, this is no time for we as Manhattan residents to rest on our laurels. We have won the equivalent of the Battle of Gettysburg — but the Civil War lasted almost two years after Lee's defeat in Pennsylvania.

Cohen-Esrey is not gone. They have not given up, and they are not out of ammunition — or the will to fight.

So once more into the breach, citizens. At 7 p.m. Oct. 7 at the Main Fire Station at Kimball and Denison avenues, the City Commission will be meeting to consider the Urban Planning Board's recommendation about this matter. It is one of three items on the agenda for that evening, but we don't know if it will be first, last or middle.

Make your voice heard. If you can't attend the meeting, then write a letter to the editor, or send a letter to the members of our city commission, as well as the mayor and the city manager.

Let your voice be heard — that's what makes democracy work. I'd even be interested in hearing from someone who is in favor of this development.

Wildcat debaters start competition this weekend

APRYL MATHES
staff writer

The Wildcat Debaters will fly into a new season this weekend at the University of South Carolina Round Robin Debate Tournament.

And that's just the beginning.

"The season runs from the middle of September until April," Susan Stanfield, debate coach, said. "That's a pretty long season, considering we start researching for the upcoming year within the first week of June."

> "I love debate. I love the travel and how the topic changes as people figure out new things to do with it."
> debate coach

However, Stanfield said she doesn't mind the extra time.

"I love debate. I love the travel and how the topic changes as people figure out new things to do with it," Stanfield said.

This year, people will be figuring out the following debate topic: Resolved: The United States will increase its security assistance to one or more countries in Southeast Asia.

Stanfield said she feels good about the issue.

"I like the area, and I think Southeast Asia is interesting," Stanfield said. "As a squad, we've always done well with foreign policy."

Sarah Glaser, junior in wildlife biology, said she's ready to tackle the issue.

"I've never studied that area before," Glaser said. "It's a very broad issue. We're dealing with 10 countries. But it's also something the media doesn't cover well, so it's a good opportunity to gather information."

When it comes to finding information, Glaser said she has mastered the art; she debated four years in high school, and this is her third year on the squad at K-State.

"Debate has taught me a lot about good research and reasoning skills," she said.

She said she hoped some of those skills will pay off when it comes time to put them to the test.

"I hope to place high at every tournament and to do very well at nationals," Glaser said.

But, before she takes on nationals, Glaser will be competing Wednesday and Thursday in the Round Robin Debate Tournament.

Glaser and her partner, Isaac West, were selected as one of the 16 top teams in the country, earning the honor to compete at the tournament. The pair is going up against teams from the University of Michigan, Emory University, Wake Forest University and the University of Texas.

"It's an honor to be selected and should provide an early test for how we will stack up against the best Cross Exam Debate Association teams in the nation," Stanfield said.

Glaser is looking forward to the challenge.

"It's going to be a lot of work, but it's a great educational opportunity," she said. "It's a lot of fun, especially when we travel."

And travel they will, Stanfield said.

"We travel about 10-12 weekends throughout the season," Stanfield said. "We go as far as South Carolina and Washington, D.C., or as close as Overland Park or Wichita."

Stanfield said she is anticipating a successful season for the squad.

"I'm looking for us to be competitive on the national circuit and also to win some major tournaments," she said.

Cats suffer game 2 troubles, win in 4

SAM FELSENFELD
staff reporter

The K-State volleyball team won again Tuesday night, defeating Southwest Missouri State 3-1 at Ahearn Field House to improve its record to 7-1.

But the No. 27 Wildcats have one little problem they need to fix to perfect their game.

The Cats need to skip game two and go directly from game one to game three.

Last Wednesday, K-State beat Wichita State 3-0, winning game one 15-0 and game three 15-3. But the Cats let the Shockers go on an 11-2 run in game two before they turned things around and took the game 15-12.

On Friday against Eastern Washington, the Cats pulled off the sweep, but not before battling to a 16-14 victory in the second game.

And game two against Boise State on Saturday? The Cats faced a Boise State game point before taking a 16-14 win.

Well, the only difference in Tuesday night's match against the Bears (6-5) is that the opponent finally broke through.

K-State jumped to a 7-0 lead in game one and eventually won, 15-5. But Southwest Missouri State became the fourth consecutive opponent to knock the Cats around during game two. The Bears jumped to a 5-1 lead and eventually won the game, 15-10.

"We played well in the first game, but I don't know what runs through our heads in the second game. I don't know if we just think we can go play around and have some fun, but we can't," senior setter Devon Ryning said.

"Teams aren't going to let us do that," Ryning added. "When a team comes in to play the 27th-ranked team in the country, they're not coming in to play around. They're gunning for us. They want to knock us off."

The game two loss broke K-State's string of 13 consecutive games won, but the Cats came out strong in game three to regain control of the match. They took a 7-0 lead and won the game 15-5.

Game four was another struggle, but the Cats topped the Bears 15-12 to close out the match. K-State coach Jim McLaughlin said the Cats played worse in the second and fourth games because they weren't sticking to the game plan, and they need to work on their consistency to remain competitive in conference play.

"We weren't operating in system. We weren't controlling the easy balls, and therefore we struggled a little bit. But once we were in system, we really lit it up," he said.

"We're spotty. We're good at certain times, but at some point in time, we need to be good from start to finish," McLaughlin said. "That takes time to train, and I don't expect us to be a complete team until November. It's not magic. It's a lot of work."

Chapman's 94-yard punt return begins award-winning game

STORY BY SUN DEE MILLS

Free safety Lamar Chapman's 94-yard punt return Saturday against Ohio triggered a memory of his first attempt to return a punt in high school in Liberal, Kan.

"I think I got 35 yards on it," Chapman said. "I remember I got into the sidelines, and I broke one of our assistant coaches' arms."

Neither the assistant coach nor Chapman was scared off by the incident. Terry Weatherspoon still coaches at Liberal.

And Chapman, in his new role as punt returner this season, isn't afraid of the defensive special teams players running full throttle at his head.

"The guys are always telling me, 'I don't see how you can do that,' with guys coming at you full of speed, and they say, 'What if you get hit?'" Chapman said. "If I get hit, oh well, I just have to bounce right back up and play."

There was no bouncing on the return Saturday night. There was just running and dodging.

"When I caught the ball, I didn't know where I was, and then I saw Keith Black push his man by the ball, and I just saw a hole on the left side," Chapman said. "There was one guy in the hole, I think it was a linebacker or the defensive end. I don't know, but I got past him."

At that point, the only thing left between Chapman and the end zone was the kicker.

"Coach Smith and Coach Fabris wouldn't be too happy if I'd gotten tackled by a kicker, so I made a move on him, and I just ran into the end zone," Chapman said.

Although those coaches warned him not to come near the sidelines if a kicker ever did tackle him, Chapman was more concerned about his peers.

"I think probably my teammates, when we got in on Monday, would've gotten on me a little bit," Chapman admitted.

If that record-setting return was all Chapman contributed to the game, it probably would have been enough to earn him the title of Big 12 Specialty Player of the Week. But Chapman also recorded 17 tackles, forced a fumble, recovered another fumble and the Bobcats' onsides' kick in the last minutes of the fourth quarter.

"I knew I had a lot of tackles because I was getting up all the time off the ground," Chapman said. "I didn't know I made 17. I thought I made 10 or something like that."

Chapman knew he was going to have a big game. He even told his roommate.

"My family doesn't come up much, at least I haven't seen them much, and they came up this weekend," Chapman said. "I told my roommate I'm going to have a good game because my parents are coming."

No doubt Mom and Dad were proud of Chapman, and Coach Bill Snyder was impressed as well.

"He put in 8 1/2 miles (on the return), all at high speed, and really played well defensively given two or three exceptions," Snyder said.

Returning a punt is the most difficult way to catch a ball, more so than any other way the ball can get to a player, Snyder said.

"You have to be pretty gifted to handle punts," he said.

Chapman was all over the field that night, but he said if the return opportunity had come in the fourth quarter, he wouldn't have been too tired to reach the end zone.

"You're tired, but it seems like when you have that ball in your hands, you get a whole lot of energy," Chapman said.

For Snyder right now, catching the ball is the

The Play

Late in the second quarter of K-State's win over Ohio on Saturday, the Cats faced third down and 30 yards to gain. Quarterback Michael Bishop took the snap and scrambled 23 yards behind the line of scrimmage, eluding a number of tackles. Bishop rolled left and heaved the football toward the end zone.

The scramble?

The pass?

The catch?

Actually, just call it The Play.

It's what K-State football fans, not to mention Ohio football fans, are talking about these days.

Quarterback Michael Bishop showed the moves everybody said he had and saved the game in the process, completing a 39-yard pass to wide receiver Gavin Peries.

But it wasn't your ordinary deep pass.

With the Wildcats facing third and 30 from the Ohio 42-yard line, Bishop took the snap and was quickly pressured.

He left the pocket and rolled right, unable to find an open receiver. When he reached the sideline, he narrowly avoided being sacked by two Ohio defenders and headed back to the left.

Bishop estimated his distance behind the line of scrimmage at "15 to 23 yards" at that point. And that's when it happened.

That's when the play became The Play.

After carrying the ball for at least 60 yards while scrambling behind the line of scrimmage, he threw it about 60 yards in the air.

Wide receiver Everett Burnett tipped the ball around the 10-yard line, and Peries grabbed it around the five while falling face-first and eventually landing at the three.

"When I rolled back, I was like, 'I can't get sacked way back here. I came back too far. I have to make something happen,'" Bishop said.

On K-State's next play, runningback Eric Hickson scored a touchdown, which boosted the Cats' lead to 20-0 after Martin Gramatica's extra point.

It seemed like just another K-State score on the way to a blowout at the time, but Bishop's scramble made a huge difference — a win instead of a loss — for the Cats.

Just call it The Play.

Of course, that's not exactly how it was designed — you know, run 60 yards by rolling right and then left, break three tackles and throw the ball farther than humans should be physically able to throw the ball so one receiver can deflect the pass to another receiver who is falling on his face.

No, Bishop didn't call "right-left scramble, break-three, double-tip" in the huddle.

It was actually supposed to be a quick, five-step drop, and somebody should have run a decent enough route to get open. But that's not how Bishop saw the play unfold.

"I took my five steps back and by the time I looked downfield, I saw that the defensive linemen were past our offensive line," he said. "So I rolled to the right, but I saw they closed off the right side. I felt somebody grab me so I tried to slap them away. I was able to slap them away, and I rolled back around and

Regional AIDS Project sponsors benefit walk

Need more info?
The walk is scheduled for Sept. 20. For more information, call Eunice Dorst at Ecumenical Campus Ministry at 587-1999.

AMY BICKEL
staff reporter

Volunteers and supporters will be walking for the AIDS cause Saturday.

The Regional AIDS Project (RAP) is sponsoring a three-mile "Walk 'N Roll For The Heartland" in City Park to raise money for case management, education and prevention.

This is the second time the program has sponsored the event. Last year, RAP raised more than $1,500 for the AIDS cause.

"We had a good turnout last year, and this year our goal is to double last year's total," said Eunice Dorst, executive director for RAP.

The program expanded into six counties, which include Geary and Riley. The money raised helps AIDS cases in these counties.

The Center for Disease Control reported 1,268 people were diagnosed with AIDS in Kansas between 1992 and 1996.

"Our program helps reduce the instances and fear of HIV through education," Dorst said.

Dorst, who took the executive director position in July, said she has been a volunteer since the program started.

She worked directly with cases and also befriended an AIDS patient for 18 months.

"People say HIV and AIDS don't exist in the area. They say it's not here — it's on the east or west coast — but it is here," Dorst said.

Registration for the walk begins at 10 a.m. Lunch and entertainment is provided afterward for walkers.

"The bands Ultimate Fakebook and Podstar offered their services free of charge," Dorst said.

Melissa Rodenbeek, pilot program instructor, is a volunteer who arranged the entertainment for Saturday's walk.

She said the project is run mostly by volunteers.

"Those who can't donate money can come and support the cause and volunteer," she said.

Rodenbeek also said the walk was a great way for people to get to know more about the program.

"The walk is important not only to help raise funds for AIDS, but to get awareness out and get people to volunteer for us," Rodenbeek said. "We get things done when people donate time."

Those wishing to walk can pick up pledge packets at the Heath Department, 2030 Tecumseh; Streetside Records, 1231 Moro St.; RAP office at Ecumenical Campus Ministry, 1021 Denison Ave.; and at Health Education in Lafene Health Center, said Reita Currie, RN health educator at Lafene.

"It's a great program," Currie said. "It's like any other activity, and we do whatever we can to support those affected."

Fifteen most frequent causes of accidents on campus in 1996.

The following chart shows the number of reported accidents per category. These figures are, as a whole lower than in 1995.

Campus injuries down, report says

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

The number of personal accidents reported on campus has dropped significantly.

According to a report done by the K-State Department of Environmental Health and Safety, the number of personal accidents in 1996 has decreased by almost one-third.

The report said that in 1995 the number of reported accidents was 835. In 1996, that figure dropped to 561. The report doesn't deal with traffic accidents or any off-campus accidents. It mainly deals with injuries on campus, which includes work-related injuries.

"Struck by or against an object" and "slips and falls" were the highest causes of injuries. The highest results of accidents were sprains or strains, lacerations and burns. The body parts most frequently injured were fingers and hands.

The Department of Housing and Dining Services and the Division of Facilities reported the highest number of accidents, with 169 and 116, respectively.

"At this time there's really no way we explain why the number of reports have dropped," said Margaret Rys, assistant professor of industrial and manufacturing systems.

"We'd have to look at the number of reports over the next few years to explain this downward trend," Rys said.

> "At this time there's really no way we explain why the number of reports have dropped."

One thing that might be attributed to this low number could be an increased amount of awareness for potential accidents.

"We need to continue to change people's attitudes about safety and continue to establish a safety behavior," said Steven Galitzer, director of the K-State Department of Environmental Health and Safety.

The Department of Campus Safety is responsible for all aspects of environmental health and safety issues concerning the K-State campus and K-State-Salina.

"We keep the Band-Aid on potential accidents," Galitzer said. "We decide if the accident could have been prevented and what steps will be taken to make sure it doesn't occur again.

"Even though accidents are down, you must always use common sense and don't do things that would precipitate an accident," he said.

main issue. Already comparisons to former Cat cornerback Chris Canty are being made regarding Chapman's abilities.

"He's one of those guys that could play on both sides of the ball for us like Chris Canty could," Snyder said. "If it weren't for our thinness there (at free safety), we would probably play him as a wide receiver as well."

Chapman had heard the stories about former Cats Canty, Mario Smith and Joe Gordon, and filled in for Gordon after he was sidelined with an injury last season.

"Those guys, they taught me a lot," Chapman said. "Every one of them when they left said to just keep the tradition going, keep having a great secondary."

A great secondary player makes great plays, the one thing Chapman said sums up his job description. Although he unknowingly bent the rules on his great return.

He said Snyder asked him if he knew where he was when he caught the ball.

"I knew I had lined up on the 15-yard line, but I didn't know that I had drifted back that far," Chapman said. "You're not supposed to catch it behind the 10-yard line."

And what was Snyder's take on the play?

"Do I want him to catch it inside the 10-yard line? Only if he can run it all the way back," he said.

Searchers find debris from cargo plane

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WINDHOEK, Namibia — Searchers found debris Tuesday from a U.S. cargo plane in the same cold, shark-infested waters where they found remnants of a German aircraft, confirming the two military planes crashed off Namibia's Skeleton Coast.

The prospects of finding survivors from Saturday's crash were getting slimmer, said Lt. Col. Eddie Brown of South Africa, who is overseeing the search effort.

He said nothing has been heard since faint distress signals were detected Sunday and early Monday. The water, at 59 degrees, "is cold, and I believe there are also sharks in the area," he said.

On Saturday, the two planes, carrying 33 people, vanished while traveling in opposite directions. The German Tupolev 154 was heading from Germany to South Africa, while the American C-141 was flying from Namibia, a coastal country northwest of South Africa, to Ascension Island, off the coast in the south Atlantic.

Only one body — that of an unidentified woman — has been found and taken to an unspecified hospital for examination. Three women were among the 24 people aboard the German plane; all nine aboard the American plane were men.

Low clouds and fog hampered visibility Tuesday for the 230 searchers scouring the ocean aboard 10 planes from Germany, the United States, France, South Africa and Namibia.

Two American C-130 planes carrying 80 people arrived early Tuesday from a Royal Air Force base in the United Kingdom to help with the search. Both planes are equipped with special night-operation equipment.

A German investigative team was awaiting better weather to fly by helicopter to the crash scene, 115 miles west of Cape Fria on the Namibian coast. The area is called the Skeleton Coast because its treacherous waters have claimed many ships.

The team was to examine debris being collected by two Namibian fishing research vessels, said South African Air Force Lt. Col. Laverne Machine.

Debris found Monday, including airplane seats and a few papers, came from the German plane, while wreckage from the American plane, including a wing flap and a compartment door, was found Tuesday.

The South African Air Force received a report Tuesday from a ship saying it saw a flash and fire Saturday, which officials believe was burning debris on the water, Brown said.

In addition, a U.S. satellite recorded a "bright flash" Saturday in the area near where the planes are thought to have collided, said Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon.

The planes were flying at an altitude of about 35,000 feet when the crash occurred, and Bacon said they were operating on different radio frequencies. Air corridors often are shared, but planes traveling in opposite directions are supposed to fly at different altitudes.

Namibian officials said the collision site was off their radar, and because they hadn't received a flight plan, they didn't know the other plane was coming.

A German Defense Ministry spokesman, Navy Capt. Hans-Joachim Liedtke, said a plan was filed with Niamey, Niger, in central Africa, and should have been passed on to the next station, the Namibian capitol of Windhoek.

"It got to Niamey. From there, there is apparently a gap to the next station in Windhoek. Who is responsible for that has to be determined at those locations," Liedtke said in Bonn, Germany.

Officials were trying to determine why the planes' disappearance was not reported to rescue officials for almost 24 hours.

Last year, the Airline Pilots' Association of South Africa warned an air collision was likely over Africa because standards recommended by the International Civil Aviation Organization were not enforced.

Jochen Sell, Namibia's chief air traffic officer, told reporters critical air traffic control procedures often are absent in Africa.

German officials said the German-operated Tupolev lacked a special radar-detecting device that would have allowed it to see if another plane was in the area.

CROSS-COUNTRY TOUR BEGINS IN LITTLE APPLE STYLE

SANDY DAVIS
staff writer

The Little Apple will hear a new kind of pop-rock tonight when Jeremy Toback and the Samples storm the Wareham Opera House.

Toback will be opening for the Samples, promoting his debut album, "Perfect Flux Thing." Manhattan is the first stop on a cross-country club tour of the United States.

Toback is an aggressive multi-instrumentalist, singer and songwriter whose songs are emotional but focused. His music is a mix of pop-rock, jazz and alternative unlike anything Manhattan has ever heard.

The Princeton-educated Toback got his start playing bass for Pearl Jam's Stone Gossard's side band, Brad. His first recorded song was called "Down" and appeared on Brad's debut album.

In 1996, after experimenting with jazz and alternative music, 30-year-old Toback found a pop songwriting voice that led to him forming a new band and recording "Perfect Flux Thing." Although he has been a part of the music business for many years, this is his big-label debut.

Toback's band started receiving publicity after playing the second stage for the East Coast portions of Lollapalooza.

His 10-song album features a wide range of musical styles, perfect for listening to while doing homework or cleaning house.

"I hope the record is sweet enough to attract people and dense enough to keep them interested," Toback said in a news release.

The headline act for the concert is the Samples, a five-member band from Boulder, Colo., known for its dynamic live performances.

The Samples will be promoting the new two-disc album "Transmissions from the Sea of Tranquility," which features 27 live, studio and private rehearsal versions of songs from throughout the band's career.

"Transmissions from the Sea of Tranquility" marks the recording debut of three of the band's new members, Rob Somers, Kenny James and Alex Matson. Original members include Sean Kelly and Andy Sheldon.

The concert featuring Toback and the Samples will be tonight at the Wareham Opera House. Doors open at 7 p.m. Tickets are $12 at Streetside Records.

"I hope the record is SWEET enough to attract people and dense enough to keep them interested."
Jeremy Toback, singer and songwriter

Four Fish Fly Free

K-State talent comes together to produce a children's TV program based on music education

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
staff writer

As music educators, teaching music is fun. But now for Mary Lynn and Chuck McMichael of Little River, Kan., fun, hopes and dreams educate beyond the classroom.

The McMichaels' new children's TV program, "Four Fish Fly Free," which originated in fall 1995, is far from any cold fish. The show, based on music education, is flying its way to success — perhaps to a network or cable television.

Chuck said he began writing a children's book with music as a Christmas present for his five children. After looking at the format of the book, Chuck and Mary Lynn thought they could further their ideas.

With the help of Jim Mock, producer and director, they had put a business plan together for the show by summer 1996.

"We had a good idea of what we wanted our characters to look like," Mary Lynn said.

A local high school freshman from Little River sketched up character drawings for the McMichaels.

"They were just what we were looking for," Mary Lynn said.

The McMichaels sent the drawings to Terry Angus, a professional puppeteer and puppet designer, for all the characters on "Four Fish Fly Free." Angus previously worked on such productions as "Fraggle Rock" and "Blizzard Island," one of his own productions.

"The sketched drawings walked right off the pages and into foam creations," Mary Lynn said.

Mary Lynn said everyone can relate to the fish. The fishes' names, Neon, Copper, Red and Blue, were created so children could easily remember and identify with the characters.

"With puppets, the kids look other than at the physical sides of humans, rather at the inner quality characteristics of the fish," she said. "They help hold the thought process. Puppets are very appealing objects, coming to life."

The McMichaels have already added a new character for their show, Ms. Stickleback the librarian, voiced by actress Betty "O" Jones.

"The sets are the element that make the show so magical," Mary Lynn said. "Kids respond to them and come awake."

She added that all the artists and sets staff were K-State students.

"We got a dream team as our production staff," Chuck said.

"Everyone brought their expertise to the show. I've never been blessed to work with so much talent in my entire life."

"The show is so different, fresh and new," Chuck said. "It's the first show to ever teach music education."

Chuck said most shows take traditional folk songs and put their own spin of lyrics with them. The McMichaels' music is all originally written.

"Where can you go without hearing music?" Chuck said.

"Nowhere in culture has music not already permeated in society."

The show covers topics such as history, elements, styles, fundamentals of music, band and choir.

"There is not a subject that you can't cross-teach with music," Chuck said.

With creative discipline strategies, the show teaches children that it's cool to have manners, and respect adults.

"The shows are made to be entertaining for children as well as adults so parents can sit down and enjoy family interaction," Chuck said.

The show premiered Aug. 22 in the Statehouse Rotunda. Adults, children and senators were all present at the pilot showing. The pilot is based on a child's fear of singing in front of others. It teaches beginning music steps, breathing and other techniques such as posture.

"During the premiere, even the parents were breathing along with the kids," Chuck said. "The show was a hit."

"We got a lot of television coverage from channels 49 and 13," Chuck said.

Chuck said KTKA-TV filmed a cover story for "Four Fish Fly Free," closing with a young child saying, "It's the best show I've ever seen on television."

Mary Lynn and Chuck received an invitation to fly to New York and attend the Walter Kaitz Foundation, a foundation that trains minority executives who work for the cable industry.

The president of the foundation is trying to bring and promote "Four Fish Fly Free" for cable television and introduce the two to all the cable networks.

The cast and crew now look for a home for their show in network, cable or home and school distribution videos.

"We're going to do a lot of business but have a lot of fun," Chuck said.

"Then all we'll have to do is be patient and wait for opportunities."

"THERE IS NOT A SUBJECT THAT YOU CAN'T CROSS-TEACH WITH MUSIC"

Farrell Library offers new 24-hour study area

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff reporter

K-State students have a new place to study on campus — anytime they want.

As part of its renovation and expansion project, Farrell Library has added a 24-hour study area, available to students and faculty, on the library's first floor.

Available since the week before classes, the area is a direct result of student needs, said Jan Crow, director of marketing and public relations for the library.

"Within the construction phase, an area was built so that students did have the opportunity to come in and study," Crow said. "We added additionally a place to eat. There they can have a Coke and a sandwich and study at the same time."

The library has installed vending machines and a cappuccino machine in the new area.

"Since no food and drink are allowed in the actual library, we made the study area a separate part from the library," Brice Hobrock, dean of Farrell Library, said. "You can't access the library directly from the area."

By the end of October, the library is hoping to have a food cart available, similar to the one found in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. Through a contract with Union Food Services, the cart will operate from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday through Friday.

During morning hours, coffee, doughnuts and pastries will be available. Lunch hours will have salads and different kinds of sandwiches according to a two-week rotating schedule.

The cart is a joint business venture of Union Food Services and Chartwells, the management company hired to help food services, Paul Stolle, director of food services, said.

In addition to the food service, Wildcat Walk, the university's escort service, is based in the study center.

"They are located there as a dispatch unit," Crow said. "A student can escort a student from the library to a parking lot or a dorm if they need to."

Wildcat Walk operates from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. every night. During peak hours, the service tries to keep six students there to accommodate everyone, Crow said.

The library relied on word of mouth for students to learn about the new area. The only publicity effort was to post signs around the library.

"What's amazing is how many students have found this," Hobrock said.

Most students so far have found the area by chance or seen the posted signs.

"I usually come in here between classes when I'm waiting around," Rachel Ronnau, junior in pre-medicine, said.

The library has already ordered more seating in the room. With more seating, the area could seat 200 people. Computer hookups are also available for students who have laptop computers.

saw Gavin two or three yards ahead of everybody on the left sideline, and I just put it up there."

It got the job done, but that's not exactly what K-State coach Bill Snyder wanted the Cats to do on third and 30, and he still wasn't happy after the fact.

"To me, that's not a play," Snyder said. "You can't survive making plays like that. You don't get very many plays like that in the Big 12 Conference. You've got to make things happen with execution. That was a result of faulty and poor execution."

Still, without The Play, K-State loses to Ohio, falls out of the top 25 and kills any chance of a nine-win season or a significant bowl game.

If the Cats lost Saturday, they would have had to fight to crack the top 20 over the course of the season. Top 10 would have been out of the question.

Here's how the game would have unfolded if The Play had been a sack:

If Bishop is sacked 23 yards behind the line of scrimmage, K-State faces fourth and 53 from its own 35. That's probably a punting situation, not to mention the score would have been 13-0, not 20-0.

K-State punter James Garcia averaged 38.9 yards on Saturday, so Ohio's returner catches the ball at the 26.

Since Ohio's defense forced a fourth and 53, its special teams have the emotional advantage and get at least 10 yards on the runback.

The Bobcats start on the K-State 36, 16 yards better than where they actually started on the possession after the touchdown.

The Bobcats drove 49 yards on 12 plays to the K-State 31. But without The Play and the better field percentage, they face fourth and two at the K-State 15.

Instead of trying to draw the Cats offside and taking a delay of game penalty to make it easier for their punter to land the ball near the goal line — as the Bobcats did in the game — they would have successfully gone for the first down.

They averaged four yards per play that drive, 5.2 for the game, and they would have had momentum.

The Bobcats would have continued the drive and scored to make it 13-7, and with that extra series of downs, K-State wouldn't have had enough time or momentum to come back and get the 55-yard field goal from Gramatica.

Halftime score: K-State 13, Ohio 7.

And with the scoring in the second half, Ohio wins 27-13. We would have dropped off the polls just as fast as Notre Dame and Texas.

So next time you see Bishop in the K-State Student Union, thank him. Sure, he didn't exactly stick to Snyder's plan. He even admits he has happy feet sometimes.

But if not for Bishop, who earned the starting job based on his athletic abilities, The Play is just a play — a bone-crushing sack.

And without The Play, we're 1-1 in Mid-American Conference play, one-half game behind Central Michigan.

Student loan problems probably won't affect K-State students, financial aid director says

BYRON VOGEL

The backlog of applications for student loan consolidation is not likely to affect K-State students, Financial Aid Director Larry Moeder said.

The Department of Education announced last week a freeze on all such applications due to a buildup of more than 134,000 requests.

Moeder, however, said the backlog will be significantly reduced before any of this year's graduating seniors are affected by it.

"There is a tremendous amount of pressure right now that's being put upon the Department of Education by the student loan community, by former students and by Congress to get this resolved," Moeder said, "so I do think it's going to get accomplished.

"It does involve a federal process, and sometimes with that you can only hope, but I do think it will be cleared out by then."

Loan consolidation ultimately allows students with numerous loans from separate loaning institutions more time to repay them.

"Rather than making individual minimum payments to each institution, students can consolidate their loans into one and make one minimum payment, so it saves quite a bit of money in monthly payment," Moeder said.

The federal government has a contract with a private servicer, Electronic Data Systems, to consolidate student loans. However, EDS has delayed processing new applications until a more efficient method can be implemented.

"The problem isn't with the direct loans program. It's with consolidation," he said.

"Right now, the goal is to correct the problems they have, to get the backlog out, to get the computer system up and running and then back in the business of doing consolidations, so hopefully it won't affect any current K-State students," he said.

VOLLEYBALL

However, he said even though the team lost a game for the first time since Aug. 31, its play is improving.

"I think they're figuring it out," he said. "They do the dynamic things well, and they put value in that.

But we have to put value in the subtle things, and as we do that, we're going to upgrade even more. We're going to get better."

McLaughlin said another problem the Cats faced was the Bears were better than teams they've faced recently.

"They've got some firepower. They had big-time outside hitters that just drilled the ball," he said.

"We really had to have discipline in some areas. But we started blocking as the match went on, and I felt it was just a matter of time if we could just side out."

Changes could simplify allocations procedures

▸COMMITTEE PROPOSES NEW DEADLINES, less paperwork for groups.

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

Amendments that could make the allocation process more user-friendly have been introduced to Student Senate.

The amendments, written by the Allocations Committee, are scheduled to be voted on during the Senate's meeting on Thursday.

The decision to restructure came this summer when the committee discussed how to improve the funding process.

"It was intimidating for the organization," said Gabe Eckert, committee chairman and junior in agricultural journalism. "We wanted to hopefully alleviate the intimidation."

Eckert hopes the amendments will change that.

A letter explaining the changes was sent to all of the groups that will be affected, and Eckert said all responses were favorable.

Under existing guidelines, groups broke promotional funding into three areas: copies, Collegian advertising and postage. If the group did not use the money given for that category, it filled out a budget-shift report to move the remainder of the money to the area where it was needed.

Justin Knopf, committee vice chairman and sophomore in agronomy, said the amendment will combine all of this money into one category called promotions. He said this will allow the groups to decide how to best use the money and will eliminate many of these budget-shift reports.

The money allotted to promotions is $75. It is based on the combined total of the three categories in the existing policy and can change based on rising costs in the future.

A similar process will occur with funding for group travel. In the past, groups have used money from three expense areas: lodging, food and mileage. It will now be consolidated into one travel category.

If a group spends less on lodging or food, it won't have to fill out a report to use the money for other expenses. The amount funded is determined by state-recognized rates for lodging, food and one-half of the lowest state rate for mileage.

Eckert said the shift back to students and organizations will allow groups to have autonomy.

"We don't know what's best for organizations. The groups will decide how best to use the money," Eckert said.

The final change moves the funding application deadline for academic competition teams — the agriculture competition team, Speech Unlimited, and the College of Business case competition team from fall to spring.

Eckert said the fall deadline forces Senate to reimburse these groups for expenses because approval for funding doesn't occur until after some groups compete.

Eckert said the new amendment provides a head start on fund raising when groups do not receive expected funding. It also eliminates the need to reimburse for expenditures.

"If they don't get as much money as they need, there will be extra time for fund raising," Eckert said.

Larry Erpelding, associate director of academic programs and the College of Agriculture liaison for Agricultural Competition Teams, said the change is positive.

Erpelding said many of his teams compete early in the fall semester, and they usually don't know how much funding they will receive until after competition.

"We generally don't know until later in the semester if we have the money, so this will be a tremendous benefit to know at the end of the spring term if we have the funding," Erpelding said.

PRAIRIE

the west side of Manhattan.

He said if the acres from the developments were totaled, they would represent more than 1,000 acres that was prairie.

When those areas were being developed, "there wasn't one iota of concern," he said. "So thank God we've got something that we can do right, to take all 1,000 and say, 'Hey, let's learn something.'"

Furthermore, Krause said, homeowners routinely dump chemicals on their lawns to keep them green without the benefit of training. Superintendents at Colbert Hills would get that training, he said.

Colbert Hills will also provide an income stream that would help pay for other K-State programs and facilities that need funding, such as periodical subscriptions for the library.

"It also provides an opportunity to bring alumni back to the university, and about 80 percent of the donations come from alumni," he said.

Krause said he recognizes the magnitude of the Colbert Hills project may make people more concerned.

"When you do it all at once, people go, 'Oh my God,'" he said.

Keane also said he wonders why other land owned by K-State isn't being used. He said land north of campus that has been used for agricultural research, now depleted from years of use, might serve the purpose if a course was necessary, and wouldn't involve extra transactions or the invasion of more prairie.

Krause said four areas in the proximity of K-State were considered by Jim Colbert, but in the end his and architect Jeff Brauer's recommendation was for the area now being studied and prepared.

Keane is not part of the team of scientists studying the Colbert Hills land. He said he regrets the absence of a more open opportunity for debate on the project. Keane added that he thought the project will go through.

"I just think that people don't have to take increasingly rare areas of land and destroy it," he said.

tion was tough on both of us, but we both have gotten over it and are moving on.

"I wish the rest of campus or whoever sent this would get over it, too," Otto said.

Residential Computer Coordinator Danya Hatley said the mail that contained profanities and graphic sexual references, was a violation of K-State policy.

"This is obviously a clear violation of K-State's acceptable-use policy," Hatley said. "When students use any computer facilities on campus, such as an ethernet connection, they have agreed to the campus policy."

Within a few hours of the mailing, Hatley said she had already spoken with officials at Computing and Network Services about an investigation.

"I've already had several conversations with CNS," she said.

According to K-State policy, the mail constitutes a class A misdemeanor and could mean up to one year in jail and a $2,500 fine for the offender.

Both Riemann and Otto said they didn't know who would send the mail, or why someone would write it.

"Obviously, Aaron didn't write that ... I don't know why someone would write that," Riemann said.

Otto said he also wished to apologize to residence hall residents for portions of the message.

"I really apologize for anything this does to people. I've lived in the residence halls, and I have a great deal of respect for the residence halls and they take some pretty bad slams and swipes at the residence halls in here and that's just not fair. They don't deserve that," Otto said.

He said the message, which said he would run for student body president in the spring, was inaccurate. Otto said he is already a fifth-year senior and will graduate in May.

Information about where the mail was sent from might come later, but Hatley said the investigation was getting started.

"I don't have that information right now," she said.

Hatley, who still hadn't seen the message, said if it was serious enough, she might send mail to listserv users explaining what happened.

"That sounds like something I need to address," she said.

GOLF

course. Colbert Hills will also become the home course for Wildcat golf teams.

The golf course will encompass about 300 acres of the property. The rest will be developed for nearly 700 residential areas and two hotel and commercial sites.

K-State has signed a 15-year management contract with PGA Tour, an association of golf professionals. Colbert Hills will be the first collegiate golf course in the country to be managed by the PGA Tour.

Krause said he vividly recalled the original conversation he had with Colbert.

"Jim said, 'You all have put together a tremendous amount of facilities. I'd really like to build on the golf program, and if I'm going to become involved, if I'm going to lend my name, my money and my reputation, it's going to have to be world-class,'" Krause said.

He said Colbert wanted at least 300 acres to work with, didn't want double-facing fairways on the course and finally made a recommendation on a site to develop. Controversy arose when it was revealed that Jack Vanier, Bob Krause's father-in-law, was the land's owner.

Krause said he immediately took himself out of authority for the site selection. The Kansas Commission on Governmental Standards and Ethics cleared Krause of any conflict of interest, but he said the arrangement is awkward in appearance.

"I don't know how else we could avoid conflict other than what we've already done," he said.

According to a KSU Golf Course Management and Research Foundation report, Vanier is in the process of forming a venture with Ritchie Associates Inc., a Wichita-based residential developer.

A skills-based youth golf academy with a budget of nearly $300,000 is also in the works. It is designed to expose underprivileged youth to the sport. Krause said he hopes to model the program after Upward Bound.

Reginland McGowan, director of the local Upward Bound program, said golf fits in perfectly with the program's goal of providing children, particularly minorities ages 10 to 18, with academic, social and cultural supplements they can use their whole lives.

"The kids see football. They see basketball, and they do that," he said. "But for whatever reason, be it economic or whatever, they don't play golf."

McGowan said that annually for the past seven years during part of Upward Bound's six-week summer program, participants have been taken to driving ranges, putting greens and courses to learn the game. He said he's looking forward to Colbert Hills' opening.

"Even if they don't want to become pro-golfers, they might be interested in the course management courses," he said.

Krause told Colbert when the plans began to develop that if K-State were to stay involved, there would have to be an educational aspect and a research opportunity.

"If this was to be simply a facility for golfing, I don't think the project would have got this far," Krause said.

The degree program for golf superintendents is in the beginning phase, but it will be administered by one or more existing schools within the university, he said. It will be the first of its kind in the country.

"Golf superintendents really need to get some formal course work in hotel management, restaurant management and hospitality as well as business administration," Krause said.

He said the curriculum would give K-State students a competitive advantage.

"I believe we will produce the next generation of golf superintendents," he said.

As for research, Krause said, K-State scientists have an opportunity to do something that's never been done before — to study land proposed for a golf course before the ground is broken.

"Our hope is that we're going to come out of this with some scientifically based information that golf superintendents can use," he said. "It's the first time a golf course plot has been studied as an ecosystem. We hope to get some universally applicable things out of this research."

Critics find fault in tobacco plan

Clinton

▶ CLINTON CALLS for $1.50 increase in cigarette prices.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton called on cigarette makers Wednesday to dig deeper to salvage the landmark tobacco deal — including raising cigarette prices by as much as $1.50 a pack. The industry and congressional Republicans found much to fault.

Clinton ignored the deal's focus on settling the lawsuits that plague tobacco companies, instead asking that Congress pass sweeping laws with one goal: stopping tobacco companies from hooking teen-agers.

His decision leaves the tobacco deal with no action this year and questions about how Congress could address it in 1998.

Republican leaders attacked Clinton's recommendations as too vague, and Senate Majority Whip Don Nickles warned that he hadn't decided whether lawmakers should offer legislation necessary for the deal even next year.

And Democrats said Clinton didn't go far enough. Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., said he would introduce legislation to force the $1.50 price increase immediately, not in 10 years as Clinton would.

Clinton withheld endorsement of the deal, which was negotiated in June between tobacco companies and state attorneys general as a way to settle dozens of anti-tobacco lawsuits.

The original terms called for companies to pay $368 billion over 25 years, curb their advertising and pay fines of up to $2 billion if teen smoking didn't drop 30 percent in five years. In return, they would gain legal protections and limits on government control of nicotine.

Clinton said companies could not deduct from their taxes any youth-smoking fines.

To further cut youth smoking, Clinton demanded curbs on advertising that might persuade teens that smoking is glamorous or hip, much as the original deal did. But he also called for full Food and Drug Administration control of nicotine and promised vague new protections for tobacco farmers.

The industry reacted angrily.

"Given the major concessions already made, we cannot support significant changes to that agreement," Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. said.

Motorist, bicyclist collide on Manhattan Avenue

NATE JENKINS
staff writer

An accident involving a motorist and a bicyclist occurred Wednesday morning on north Manhattan Avenue near the K-State campus.

No official injury report was available Wednesday. According to a Riley County Police Department report, the bicyclist, Bradley Phillips, 19, suffered an "apparent broken leg."

No information on the status of the motorist, Mark Barnett, 25, was available.

Barnett was southbound on Manhattan Avenue when he passed a stopped car at the pedestrian crossing and hit Phillips, who was traveling east on his bicycle across the walkway.

Ambulances arrived at the scene and transported Phillips to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue.

K-State student Kevin Neitzel was walking to class when he witnessed the accident.

"The car hit the guy on the bicycle in the legs, and he flew up against the windshield and broke it," Neitzel said.

"He hit him pretty much full speed," he said.

Police said Barnett received a notice to appear in court for passing a stopped vehicle at a marked crosswalk.

Phillips received a notice to appear for riding through a safety zone.

"K-State is pretty comparable with the others. The thing that is fascinating is the nature of the interaction with the students."

staff reporter

The Kansas Board of Regents got a taste of future educational practices at K-State on Wednesday.

Elizabeth Unger, vice provost for academic services and technology and dean of Continuing Education, along with four other K-State faculty members, demonstrated the concept of information technology in the classroom.

"We want the rooms to be Harvard style," Unger said. "This will allow all of the students to be able to see and to be heard."

Unger said nine classrooms have common core capabilities, and there will be an update of 21 classrooms and Eisenhower Hall with this new technology.

She also said 186 classes at K-State use the World Wide Web for educational purposes.

The most changed classroom on campus is Ackert 219. Mark Decker, assistant professor of biology said, in a taped interview, the Principles of Biology class is going very well with the changes.

"We now have 20 work stations for the students," Decker said. "Each station has two computers with four students."

Decker said this allows more interaction among the students and the teachers. Ackert 219 also uses digitized video and has a new high-tech projection system.

"It is a state of the art learning studio," he said.

Martin Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, sociology and social work, showed the regents how he uses the Web and PowerPoint in his anthropology courses.

"The Web is a remarkable tool for students," Ottenheimer said. "They can obtain so much information in such a short amount of time."

Unger also said 200 faculty members are now using some sort of new technology in the classroom, and all faculty use e-mail.

"We are very impressed with the way the faculty is willing to use all these new ideas and equipment," Unger said.

Carolyn Wilken, associate professor of family studies and human services, raised the most questions from the regents with her class that is taught on the Web.

"People from all over the country take this course," Wilken said. "It has been very successful so far."

Some board members were concerned about the problem of actually knowing who is on the other side of the computer and the time that a class such as this would take.

Wilken said she could tell the student

Technology adds freshness to biology

An old mainstay has a snazzy new suit.

The Principles of Biology class has been revamped to bring interactive technology into the classroom. Beginning this semester, students will use a classroom full of computers to understand principles that had been taught using an out-dated audio system.

Now, instead of sitting in a large lecture hall or listening to an old taped recording, students are working at computers connected to the World Wide Web.

The textbook hasn't been replaced but professors hope a technology-filled classroom can improve how well students grasp concepts.

The method is based on the concept that people will learn if they are active in the process.

With the hands-on studio model, students can understand the implications of what they are seeing, Mark Decker, assistant professor of biology, said.

Decker accepted a new biology position created to implement this course and is responsible for the content of the lessons.

While on the computer, a student can see a process operate and can change the input variables, Decker said.

For instance, while studying photosynthesis, students can vary the amount and type of light and watch the effects of those influences on a plant.

Before the class was revamped, students sat in cubicles and listened to audio-tutorial tapes that highlighted information from the text.

"The idea was that students learn at different rates. This way they could take as much time as they wanted," Decker said.

Decker said the old system had two drawbacks. The first drawback was the student worked independently and without feedback. The second drawback was technological. The 1960s tape players were old and deteriorating, Decker said.

"The basic material was updated, but the way it was taught moved dramatically to the active learning collaboration, critical thinking and learning to learn way of instruction," Vice Provost Elizabeth Unger said.

Unger said the biology class is one of the top 30 courses in terms of student demand on campus and one in which faculty were interested in redesigning, because it usually has 800 students enrolled each semester.

K-State has eight other technology classrooms but only in Ackert 219 is the technology integrated so fully, said Anthony Phillips, computer information specialist at Computing and Network Services. Phillips helped set up the new biology classroom.

"The class is still very much hands-on. The computer is just another tool — a very interactive tool," he said.

One of the hands-on sections includes dissecting a fetal pig, he said.

In Ackert 219 there are 44 computer work stations arranged in a semicircle around the instructor's computer. On either side are two large projection screens. There is also a full sound system, because the instructor wears a microphone.

At each work station four students sit around two computers. Each computer is shared by two students as partners.

K-State Access Technology System to allow students access to personal information by semester's end

K-Staters will have Internet access to their student records by the end of the semester.

The service, K-State Access Technology System, will allow students access to information about themselves without having to wait in line or make a phone call.

With KATS, information such as semester schedules, financial account status, graduate admissions status, semester grades, hometown address and phone number will be available on the World Wide Web among other places, Gunile DeVault, associate registrar, said.

The information would be accessible from the Web, telephone and kiosks in Farrell Library, the Office of the Registrar and the K-State Student Union.

Access to all three methods requires a student ID number and a PIN issued by the university.

More options will be available as the system develops.

Students will be able to order transcripts and eventually enroll and drop or add classes to semester schedules.

The capability to enroll and drop or add will be the last part of the system available because these are more complicated processes, DeVault said.

Some are visual or manual processes that must be incorporated into electronics.

Those features will be added about a year after the system is installed.

"This is a system with great potential," DeVault said.

DeVault said the system also includes a certain amount of responsibility.

Students must keep the university updated on their address and people to notify in case of an emergency.

In Kansas, Washburn University has a Voice Response System and Wichita State University has parts of what K-State will have, DeVault said.

Peanut allergy passed on during liver and kidney transplant

BOSTON — A man who received a new liver and kidney in an organ transplant also got something he didn't want — an allergy to peanuts.

French doctors described the unusual case, which occurred eight years ago, in Thursday's issue of the New England Journal of Medicine.

A 22-year-old man who knew he was allergic to peanuts ate them by mistake when he had Chinese food with satay sauce, which contains peanuts. He fell into a coma and died.

Doctors gave his liver and right kidney to a 35-year-old man and his pancreas and left kidney to a 27-year-old woman. Neither was told of the cause of the organ donor's death.

Three months later, the man suffered a skin rash and difficulty breathing after eating peanuts. After concluding he had a newly developed allergy, the doctors fed peanuts to the woman under close medical supervision, but she showed no ill effects.

Doctors are unsure why one patient got the allergy and the other did not. However, they speculated that blood cells primed to recognize peanuts as foreign were passed along in the transplanted liver.

The man was told to avoid peanuts, and he is still healthy. The case was reported by Dr. Christophe Legendre and others from Necker Hospital in Paris.

Fraternities reject alcohol ban

CARBONDALE, Ill. — More community service? No problem. Better grades? Hey, we'll try. But no alcoho lin the fraternities? Forget it!

A conduct code being tested by the National Interfraternity Conference with the possibility of adding it to colleges across the country has been rejected by leaders of the 13 fraternities at Southern Illinois University.

The battle is about booze.

University administrators said the Select 2000 program being tested here could help decrease reckless partying and binge drinking, as well as boost the public's image of so-called party schools. It calls on students to become better citizens by nurturing good values, improving grades and doing community service.

But it also prohibits fraternities and sororities from throwing parties that feature alcohol. Those of legal age can drink alcohol in their rooms this year, though that will be banned next fall.

The SIU Interfraternity Council voted against the policy earlier this week.

Fraternity leaders said they already do much of what's required under Select 2000. Tim Hoerman, president of the Graduate and Professional Student Council said it unfairly punishes fraternity members who are of legal drinking age. "Who's to say they can't have a beer?" he said.

The vote startled Jonathan Brant, director of the interfraternity conference.

"It's baffling," said Brant, who listened last week as the student leader of SIU fraternities, Nick Dodd, extolled the policy's virtues. "I think this is a poor decision on their part."

Federal plan calls for approval of narcotic lollipop for cancer pain

GAITHERSBURG, Md. — A raspberry-flavored lollipop loaded with narcotic painkiller for treatment of cancer patients was recommended for federal approval Wednesday, despite concerns about accidental poisoning of children.

A Food and Drug Administration advisory panel voted unanimously that the benefit to cancer patients from the pain-killing candy far outweighed the risk of young children being harmed.

"Some kid, somewhere, somehow is going to do this (eat the lollipop)," said Suzanna Brown, a Portland, Ore., nurse and a member of the panel. "But do we deny this benefit to cancer patients for that reason?"

FDA approval is required before the lollipop can be sold, but the agency generally follows the recommendations of advisory committees.

The lollipop, called Actiq, is to be manufactured by Anesta Corp. of Salt Lake City and marketed in partnership with Abbott Laboratories.

The drug is actually a sugar-based lozenge on a stick. It is loaded with fentanyl citrate, a narcotic commonly used in other forms to treat cancer pain. The lollipop is an off-white color and the stick bears a large "Rx" mark.

Anesta officials said the product is designed to be unattractive to children and is packaged in a foil pouch that studies showed could not be opened by children up to the age of 4.

Lecturer dismisses contemporary suburbia

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Watching slides of suburban houses sitting on remote wilderness sites that were isolated from a strip mall miles away, people gasped and laughed.

It was obvious who had the last laugh on Tuesday night when James Howard Kunstler delivered the first Lou Douglas Lecture of the school year, "Can America Survive Suburbia?"

Kunstler wasn't so much describing the banalities of his upstate New York town, Saratoga Springs, as he was showing Manhattan what it has become.

Kunstler preached his lecture with hellfire and brimstone — like Howard Beale screaming we're "not going to take it anymore" — mixed with enough self-deprecating humor to keep the audience giggling.

"Every time we put up a building that's not worth looking at we're helping to build a town that's not worth caring about," Kunstler said. "These acts of civic vandalism thunder through our lives."

Kunstler repeatedly emphasized the importance of the streetscape, that three-to four-story buildings should sit on tree-lined streets interrupted by small pockets of open space and parks. He criticized the fashion of large parking lots fronting box discount stores and strip malls; instead he suggested that parking be hidden in the middle of the block and stores engage the sidewalk with windows and architectural interest.

"Space has to be legible," he said. "What used to be the heart of town has become an illegible space nobody cares about."

Another recurring theme was landscapers who hide bad architecture with bushes set in shredded bark beds, which he calls the "Band-Aid of landscaping over bad civic design."

It's fitting that Gary Coates, professor of architecture, introduced Kunstler as "in the best tradition a citizen." Kunstler is no expert, but simply a person — who could be your neighbor — and has taken it upon himself to begin addressing the problems of his town's urban plan. His background is popular journalism.

What has made Kunstler such a success in terms of the media is his ability to bring the level of discussion down to layman's terms. Gone are the confusing charts, graphs and detailed analysis of professional urban planning and study. Kunstler's books could be repackaged as a "Town Planning for Dummies" series.

That isn't necessarily a bad thing, either. One of the reasons town planning sucks is because the common, ordinary townsfolk have quit taking an interest, leaving it to money-grubbing developers, uninformed city officials and poorly trained professionals.

Kunstler is the noisy, pissy citizen who stands up in the back of the city council meeting yelling about good design, human scale and proper land use. And more and more people are listening to or reading his two books: "The Geography of Nowhere" and the recent "Home From Nowhere."

Kunstler has tacked himself onto the New Urbanism movement, which seeks to create neighborhoods and cities that are vital and worth caring for — like little English villages with town greens, important buildings in important sites and a range of mixed-use building types incorporating residential, commercial and light industrial.

The New Urbanist's Mecca is Seaside, Fla. — a vacation community of expensive, architect-designed homes that follows traditional planning methods.

In his lecture, he readily attacked the Modern movement, but what he was really attacking was bad Modernism. It may be a bit fresh to dismiss Modernism when the New Urbanism is relatively unproven as an economical and possible answer to civic design problems.

The groundbreaking treatise on this movement, however, was written nearly 36 years ago with the arrival of Jane Jacobs' "The Death and Life of Great American Cities" (1961).

Jacobs writes, "Thirty years from now, we shall have accumulated new problems of blight and decay over acreages so immense that in comparison the present problems of the great cities' gray belts will look piddling ... This is exactly what we, as a society, have willed to happen."

Jacobs' frightening, visionary work still reads as fresh as ever, and it's clear Kunstler owes Jacobs a great deal. If anything, his writing is a reinforcement of Jacobs' and all the more reason to revisit the present through her past.

College of Engineering celebrates success at national competitions

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

The College of Engineering celebrated national success in a reception Wednesday in the Rathbone Hall atrium.

Championships in aviation design and robotics and a successful first-year placement in a national solar car contest were the toasts of the day.

"Clearly, these talented K-State engineering students compete successfully at the highest levels," Terry King, dean of the College of Engineering, said.

Willie the Robot took first place as K-State's entry in the annual American Association for Artificial Intelligence Mobile Robot Competition and Exhibition in August.

Willie competed against several other robots in a home-like environment. While maneuvering around tables and couches, he had to identify and pick up six things including a cup of coffee, a bunch of grapes, a remote control and a pill box.

Willie picked up four. Competition officials expected the entrants to be able to pick up one or two.

David Gustafson, professor of computing and information, advised the four-member team and said the other entrants dropped out after seeing K-State's success.

A joint Kansas team won the 1997 NASA/FAA National General Aviation Design Competition in August. Members of the team came from the University of Kansas and Wichita State University. Eight came from K-State.

The design for a four-passenger kit plane featured technical strength and practicality and would require $75,000 to buy and 200 hours to build a strength in the competition.

The solar car Solution participated in a 10-day race from Indianapolis, Colo., to Colorado Springs in June. It finished second of four first-year entrants and in the middle in the field of 36, despite being inexperienced.

In the biennial competition intercollegiate race, teams must design, build and race a solar-powered vehicle.

Eric Shumaker, senior in electrical engineering, plans to use this year's experience when working on next year's race.

"You get better by watching the other schools," he said.

Professor speaks about development, support of water-control technology in New World

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Recent research in geography indicates Franciscan monks brought Spanish water-control technology to the New World.

William E. Doolittle, a professor of geography at the University of Texas at Austin, spoke Wednesday at Dickens Hall. The speech, sponsored by the Department of Geography, focused on how Franciscan monks brought Spanish aqueducts to support the monasteries throughout Texas and Mexico.

Doolittle said he is trying to understand the larger idea of water systems by focusing on only one part — aqueducts. Specifically, he is studying aqueducts built between 1520 and 1800 when Spanish influence governed the southwest.

The aqueducts were large features on the landscape that stood out. Many of them incorporated arches to raise the actual channel above ground. There are still many good examples of Spanish aqueducts in Mexico today, Doolittle said.

"It's really just rubble construction," Doolittle said.

He explained that rubble construction incorporates loose rock mortared and filled rather than cut stones. This stands out from other aqueducts around the world that were built with cut stones mortared in place.

These aqueducts were constructed during the time Spain was claiming new lands in what is now Mexico and the American southwest. However, the monks in the Franciscan orders were not educated in the architecture and engineering required to build these structures.

At first, Doolittle thought the monks used native technology from Indians in Mexico and the southwest. Those cultures built aqueducts with loose rubble that are still in excellent condition today, Doolittle said.

He hypothesized that the monks used the native populations to build the aqueducts where they were needed.

In order to investigate further, Doolittle traveled to Spain. When he arrived, he saw the same type of rubble construction in Spanish aqueducts, which disproved his original hypothesis.

"I've still got another two months in Spain, and this project's shot from day one," Doolittle said.

However, he found the explanation on a resort island off the coast of Spain called Menorca.

"Menorcans like to stack rocks," Doolittle said. "They build walls all over this island."

They also built windmills to pump water and aqueducts to carry that water to agricultural areas, Doolittle said. The height of these endeavors was during the same time as Franciscan monks from Menorca were going to the Spanish New World. More importantly, the aqueducts were the same construction style as those Doolittle had studied in Mexico.

Doolittle said a disproportionately high number of Menorcan monks went to the New World. With them, they took the cultural knowledge of building aqueducts.

He is now working on furthering his aqueduct research in Spain, Portugal and France.

"There's certainly a lot more work to do, but that's where I'm going," Doolittle said.

Student Senators should vote to implement punitive legislation

Do student senators really remember why they made the effort to run for office? Was it to represent what students think and believe, or was it to vote for what they themselves think without regard to student concern?

Tonight, Student Senate will be voting on an issue that would change the impeachment process of student senators, the student body president and vice president, and other members of the Student Governing Association.

This change would require the Student Senate chair to bring impeachment charges against most elected and appointed members of SGA if convicted of a misdemeanor or a felony.

According to the legislation, a majority approval from Student Senate would be needed for the impeachment to proceed from the initial charges to Student Tribunal, where a two-thirds vote would remove any individual from office.

Amendments will be made to increase the required Senate vote to two-thirds rather than a simple majority. This would be wrong. Senators know how difficult it is to get a two-thirds majority on any issue — much less on an impeachment process. Changing the required vote would essentially take the teeth out of this legislation.

SGA members should be responsible enough to avoid getting in trouble with the law, but the past has shown that might not be the case.

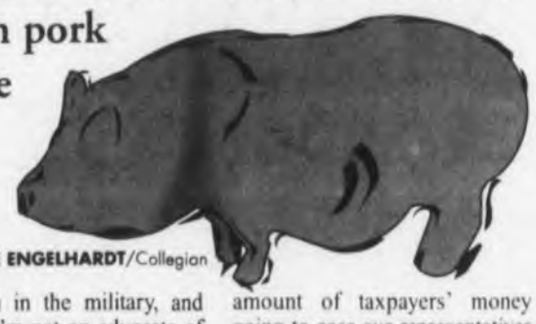
They should be held to a higher standard because they are public officials. They should not represent the students of K-State if they can't even obey the law.

When senators are voting tonight, they should ask themselves a question.

If they weren't a member of SGA, how would they feel if the person were was voting on millions of student dollars was convicted of a DUI, an MIP, a shoplifting charge or something worse?

Senators, remember why you ran for office. Vote for students and not for your own concerns.

And students, go up to a senator and tell them what you think. If you don't know who your senator is, most will be wearing purple metallic name tags.



They are representing you. They are allocating your money. Tell them how to vote.

ENTITLEMENTS: HANDOUTS AREN'T JUST FOR WELFARE QUEENS ANYMORE

Congress should take a look at its own pork barrel spending before cutting into the checks of those who need help.

Two years ago this winter, while I was serving on the U.S.S. Abraham Lincoln in Washington state, I received notice that I should not be surprised if my pay was withheld because of the inability of Congress and the president to reach a budget agreement.

As a petty officer second-class who was living paycheck to paycheck, I could not have been more surprised to find that the spending cuts that had clogged up the government in this manner did not include a cut in Congressional pensions.

Before we talk about those pensions, let me tell you a few things about myself so that I may avoid being labeled a hypocrite. I have sucked up my share of government money. I was in the military for 5 1/2 years. During that time I used both the WIC program and the food stamp program because, to be perfectly honest, military pay pretty much bites.

Since I have been out of the military, I have taken advantage of unemployment insurance, the Montgomery G.I. Bill and, like many of my fellow students, federal student loans and grants.

Recently, I saw former Sen. Bob Packwood on one of those weekend political talk show programs. He said the most recent budget showed that the GOP had lost some of its courage because there were no cuts for entitlements. The specific entitlements he mentioned were Medicare and military-retirement programs.

Maybe I'm being idealistic, but it seems to me that the cuts are starting at the wrong end. I have been in the military, and although I'm not an advocate of defense spending or staying in the service, the people who hang in there long enough to earn a federal pension really do earn it.

During my time on board the Lincoln, we spent half of every year under way, away from our families and homes. I wonder how that equates to spending evenings at cocktail parties with lobbyists. Hmmm ...

You might think that I'm being harsh on our legislators (and I am), but the simple fact is they are public servants, the same as police officers or street sweepers. Within the public they are serving, only 50 percent of private-sector employees are covered by a pension plan.

Not only are all members of Congress covered by the Congressional pension plan, more than 250 of them (according to the National Taxpayers Union Foundation and the Heritage Foundation) will become "pension millionaires" if they live to the current life expectancy age of 84.

Here are some numbers that might surprise you. According to the taxpayers union and Charles Levendosky, a syndicated columnist with the New York Times News Service, when Reps. Pat Schroeder and Robert Walker retire this year, they will collect lifetime benefits estimated at $4.1 million.

Your next question, I guess, would be how much of that money is mine? I would love to tell you, but even under a Freedom of Information Act request, I couldn't get it. The amount of taxpayers' money going to ease our representatives into their golden (in all senses of the word) years is not available to the public.

It gets worse. These pensions come with special provisions that provide for automatic cost-of-living allowances. These boost the retirees' incomes each year based on inflation.

According to the Wall Street Journal, only 10 percent of private-sector retirement plans include a cost-of-living allowance. The Journal also points out that Congress' pension system is about twice as generous as private-sector plans.

Dan Greenberg, a Congressional analyst with the Heritage Foundation, suggests that the only way to improve the system is to implement some version of Florida Rep. Dan Miller's proposal that would replace the system with a tax-exempt savings plan, similar to a 401(k). According to Miller's plan, taxpayers would no longer have to match contributions to Congressional pensions and those contributions would be capped at 12 years in order to decrease incentives for careerism.

That brings us to the final point, that the system was created to keep people from becoming careerists. The Senate Report that began it in 1946 said it would "bring into the legislative service a larger number of younger Members with fresh energy and new viewpoints concerning the economic, social and political problems of the Nation."

How's it working so far, Sen. Helms?

Paving the way SOME WOMEN EARNED EQUAL RIGHTS NEARLY 1,400 YEARS AGO

In today's world, women are still fighting for their rights. Hey, this is the 20th century. I guess this is when society should realize it's about time — let's give them a voice of their own.

Alas, this will not happen. Man is ungrateful for his authority.

Encyclopedia Britannica describes women's status in the Roman civilization as "completely dependent, the wife was the purchased property of the husband like a slave acquired only for his benefit ... a woman could not be a witness, could not adopt or be adopted or make a will or contract."

The English Common Law claims, " ... all real property which the wife held at the time of marriage became the possession of her husband ... as time passed the English courts devised means to forbid a husband (to) transfer real property without the consent of his wife ... He had the right to spend it as he saw fit."

Freedom for women has never been mentioned in the history books — it never occurred. The 20th century will surely have its place in this history.

So what do we see today that we didn't see yesterday? We see a double standard. When human rights are mentioned, women mark the top of the list, child abuse later. Women's liberation or emancipation is a disguised form of exploitation of her body, deprivation of her honor and degradation of her soul.

Islam existed during the Roman and Byzantine dynasty. It gave women rights and privileges 1,400 years ago that they had never enjoyed under other religious or constitutional systems. This can be understood when the matter is studied as a whole in a comparative manner, rather than partially.

The rights and responsibilities of Muslim women are equal to those of a man but not necessarily identical to them. Equality and sameness are two different things. Equality is desirable, just, fair. Sameness is not. People are not created identical, but they are created equals.

Islam does not make men the dominant lord of women who have no choice but to surrender to men.

Islam has established for women that which suits their nature, gives them full security and protects them against disgraceful circumstances and uncertain channels of life.

I don't need to elaborate on the status of modern women and the risks they run to make a living or establish themselves. I do not even need to explore the miseries and setbacks that encircle them as a result of the so-called rights of women. Nor do I intend to manipulate the situation of many unhappy homes that break because of the very freedom and rights of which modern women are proud.

Women in Islam are recognized by Islam as full and equal partners of men in the procreation of humanity. By this partnership women have an equal share in every aspect, including equal rights and equal personal and common responsibilities in receiving rewards for their deeds. She is acknowledged as an independent personality, in possession of human qualities and worthy of spiritual aspirations.

Islam grants women equal rights to contract, to enterprise, to earn and possess independently. Their lives, their property, their honor are as sacred as those of man.

Apart from recognition of women as independent human beings acknowledged as equally essential for the survival of humanity, Islam has given them a share of inheritance. They are also entitled to freedom of expression as much as men.

Islam does not state these rights in a statistical form and then relax. It has taken all measures to safeguard them and put them into practice as integral articles of faith. It never tolerates those who are inclined to prejudice against women.

Men are solely responsible for the complete maintenance of the house. It is their duty by law to assume all financial responsibilities and maintain their dependents adequately. Financial responsibilities lie with women if they desire to have luxurious expenses apart from their basic needs.

Surely one could say women can exercise their rights today or at least a portion of them. But imagine if these rights were given to women 1,400 years ago. No other religion or constitution has given such rights to women — these laws were decreed by Allah, the one supreme being. Women's rights match beautifully with their duties. The balance between rights and duties is maintained, and no side overweighs the other.

It is a distribution of God's abundance according to the needs of the nature of which God is the maker. And he knows best what is good for women and what is good for men.

God is absolutely true when he says in the Koran: "O mankind! Be dutiful to your Lord, Who created you from a single person, and from him he created his wife, and from them both he created many men and women and fear Allah through whom you demand your mutual (rights)..." Women:1.

Fashion tips for the fashion senseless

Labor Day has come and gone, and the longtime fashion rule of not wearing white shoes until Easter is in effect.

Guys, I'm sorry, but most of my opinion on this topic is not directed toward you. I'll devote a column to you later. Just so you know, yes, you can wear white tennis shoes, just keep them clean. However, if you're planning to wear white patent-leather wing tips, don't.

I noticed some people don't believe in the old no-white-shoes rule. I saw too many pairs of white shoes at the Career Fair this week. An outfit can be made or broken with a pair of shoes.

Start building your career and casual wardrobe now so it won't be a headache later. The old shoe box in the sky is calling all white shoes to rest until the Easter Bunny comes bouncing into town.

NAKIA Y. WALLER

NAKIA Y. WALLER is a senior in public relations. You can send e-mail to Nakia at kobey@ksu.edu.

I'd also like to suggest a few other helpful rules of fall fashion. I know what you're thinking. You're thinking, "Nakia, what makes you an expert?" Well, I'm not an expert. But I wouldn't suggest anything I wouldn't do myself.

For starters, let's put the white skorts and short-sleeve jean shirts to rest. It didn't work this summer, and it has no place in the wardrobe of the fall fashion conscious.

Fall is your opportunity to develop your style.

For those people who chose to wear velvet-type fabrics this summer, you jumped the gun. Velvet and suede are fall and winter fabrics. Wearing them in the summer only makes you look hot, not spicy.

A fashion rule I hold dear all year is the correct use of Spandex. Spandex is OK to wear when you're going to work out or you're late to class.

It's not OK to wear Spandex as a part of your everyday fashion rotation unless you have the body of Tyra Banks. Know what your body looks good in and emphasize those features. If you don't know what they are, enlist the help of a fashion-conscious friend and go shopping.

Set a budget so you don't do more harm than good and knock yourself out. The word from the highest fashion authority, Vogue magazine, is that legs are the body part of the year. The article pictures reasonable outfits that could be found in Manhattan Town Center.

But beware, there were also things pictured that would only look good on the typical professional model who weighs slightly less than a box of Rice Krispies.

It would be interesting if the women of K-State would adopt the all-legs style of fashion this fall the way MC Hammer pants caught on in the earlier part of this decade.

To get these trendy looks, shopping at high-end department stores is not necessary. The discount stores carry nice clothes at reasonable prices. Season-end purchases make great buys and allow you to be ready for next year.

Just because you might not have spent much money doesn't mean you can't look like much. I had the occasion to catch an end-of-summer sale on shirts quite similar to the one I have on in my column picture. Knowing the style of shirt was such that it would carry over into next spring and summer, I bought one in every color that looked good on me. The shirt had been priced at $29, but I bought it for $9.75.

The simple coordination of different, yet matching, colors and styles can get you through the school week. I'm not talking a different pair of sweats for every day of the week. Instead, vary your wardrobe with jeans, slacks and the all-important sweat suit.

You have to build on a wardrobe, which is why it's important to take proper care of your clothing.

Freshmen: Your parents kept your whites white by washing like colors together. Try it — it works. For those of you who know and understand this rule yet want as few loads as possible, I understand — but remember, not everything goes in the dryer.

Many cottons will fade and fuzz quicker if they are dried too often, especially if they are not high quality. Every once in a while you need to dress up. Having something on hand for those occasions is important. Women, remember, no dark stockings with light or white shoes. White does not go with everything.

Men, always knock the dust off your dress shoes before you wear them. Other things to keep in mind are simple grooming habits. I know 8:30 a.m. comes early, but soap and water on the face and brushing your teeth can do wonders. Some people seem to think no one will notice, but when you cough in class and people two rows ahead of you can smell the beer on your breath from the night before, there is a problem.

Nail polish colors are really hot this year. I would not take that fashion leap personally, but it's an interesting trend. A friendly reminder: Chipped nail polish is tacky. If you're going to wear it, wear it well. It would be better to go with no polish at all than to have your nails partially painted.

For those of you who still don't get it, powder-blue eye shadow went out of fashion more than a decade ago. Don't highlight with it. Don't even think of painting your entire eyelid with it. Destroy it, and throw it away so no one else will find it and make the same mistake.

I'm not condoning a certain look, because I think fashion can be created by an individual. I would, however, like to offer these fashion rules and reminders for those lost souls in need of guidance.

Intellectual property policies pose concerns

Editor,

Many of us are deeply troubled by the University's intellectual property policies concerning technology, www.ksu.edu/uauc/docs/policy.html.

Except for not being allowed to claim they are "official," the personal World Wide Web pages are essentially under the same restrictions as "official" Web pages. In addition, the multimedia policy effectively makes any work created with university equipment, including equipment in the "public" labs, property of the university. One must think twice before typing in a public computing lab.

Not only can the university remove files or Web pages from your account, it can also claim ownership of your papers, computer programs, music, artwork, poetry or anything else created using university equipment.

If students and others associated with the university are to be given equipment and virtual space in which to create, express and communicate, then they should be allowed to do so with only those restrictions necessary to ensure reliable operation of equipment.

The university should allow the creation of works without reserving the right to claim ownership, and should explicitly state the conditions where they will not claim ownership rights. For example, excluding works created using "public" computing resources or resources given for use in association with class work, public service or an educational project.

Reader calls for fewer religious columns

Editor,

I am an alumni who enjoys reading the Electronic Collegian on the Internet each morning. I have always believed that K-State journalism students present a wonderful collegiate newspaper.

However, I am becoming alarmingly concerned with all the religious articles appearing in the editorial pages. It seems that every day there is a "sermon" from one denomination or another. It is important to note that I have noticed more than just Christianity being promoted, but does this diminish the fact that religion of any kind is being championed by a state taxpayer-sponsored entity?

If the Collegian wants to be in the business of promoting religion, please at least devote a separate section to this topic. Religion does not belong on the same page as editorials.

Opportunity Fair builds futures

SARA BURDETTE
staff reporter

The Opportunity Fair on Wednesday in the K-State Student Union provided a chance for students to build their futures.

"It is a good way for people to get involved in activities that will help build their résumé," Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said. "You can develop a lot of skills doing volunteer work."

This is the third year for the fair and the best attendance so far, Karen Pence, assistant dean for the College of Human Ecology, and Olivia Collins, assistant professor of family studies and human services, said.

"We have an increased number of organizations this year," Collins said. "There is a lot more traffic so far."

Forty-three organizations participated in the fair this year.

Pence said the conversations were good this year as well.

"I think that there is a lot more interaction," she said.

The fair is put on by Career and Employment Services, the College of Human Ecology and the School of Family Studies and Human Services.

Collins coordinated the fair with help from Pence and Henderson. In addition, Michele Hafer, senior in family life community services, served as student coordinator.

The group's goal was to provide information to students and the community about volunteer services.

"It lets students and faculty members become aware of community services and agencies in the community," Hafer said. "It strengthens the community and helps prepare people for their future."

Although the people organizing the event worked hard to promote the agencies, the agencies also worked hard to recruit and inform the students and faculty.

Amy Wynne, senior in hotel and restaurant management, worked at the Kaw Valley Girl Scout table.

"We are trying to get more notice out there," she said. "Of course, it's always nice to get volunteers."

Adene Winter, state director for Mother to Mother ministries, said she not only wants to make people more aware of her organization, but also wants to inform them of the volunteer opportunities for students.

"Our goal is to cross racial and economic boundaries to form friendships between low-income women and adequate-income women," she said. "We offer opportunities for students to support mothers, aid in child care and participate in internships."

Winter said they mostly get family studies and human services majors but some students who are majoring in social work also apply.

For students who missed the Opportunity Fair, Amy Spear, career specialist at the Academic and Career Information Center, said the ACIC will have all the information from the tables in Holton 14.

1,400 high school students on campus for conference

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

Nearly 1,400 high school students will be on campus today for the Kansas Scholastic Press Association's 16th annual fall journalism conference.

The event is titled "Lead with your right stuff."

The KSPA Fall Conference will take place in the K-State Student Union and Kedzie Hall.

The conference will get started at 8 a.m. with an early bird session. This session is a new event that allows high school students to gain more information, and it will relieve some of the heavily attended sessions offered later in the day.

The conference will also feature two keynote speakers, Jim Jordan and H. L. Hall.

Jordan teaches and advises students at Del Campo High School in Fair Oaks, Calif., and will speak to newspaper students.

Hall teaches and advises students at Kirkwood High School in Kirkwood, Mo., and will speak to yearbook students.

The students will be able to choose from 60 instructional sessions. There will also be special programming features that will include an idea forum, publications swap shops, a World Wide Web workshop and the Journalism Education Association certification test.

"The goals of the conference are to educate students, but it is also a time for high school students to see K-State — a recruitment trip to show what K-State has to offer," Linda Puntney, fall KSPA conference director, said.

"The main purpose of the conference is to help make journalism scholastics better around the state," Puntney said.

Many K-State students will assist with the conference. Most of these students participated in a KSPA conference when they were in high school.

Police seeking owner of possible 2nd car

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PARIS — Investigators are seeking the owner of a small Fiat that may have been bumped by the Mercedes Princess Diana was riding in before it slammed into a concrete pillar in a Paris tunnel, a police source said Wednesday.

The revelation came after tests on pieces of a tail light and car paint traces found at the scene showed they didn't come from the Mercedes, the source said on condition of anonymity.

Now being tested in a police laboratory, the evidence is leading investigators to consider the possibility that a second car was involved in the Aug. 31 accident that killed Diana, her companion, Dodi Fayed, and driver Henri Paul.

Investigators have been focusing on Paul, who was legally drunk and on anti-depressants at the time of the crash. He also was believed to have been driving at a speed of nearly 120 mph.

Still, investigators have yet to find a clear cause for the crash as the car was tailed by paparazzi.

Investigators hope by Friday to question the lone survivor of the crash, Fayed's bodyguard Trevor Rees-Jones, who is now fully conscious. His parents said Wednesday that he walked for the first time since the accident.

"He can now sit out of bed for a few hours a day and has taken his first steps," they said in a statement issued by the British Embassy in Paris. "He can communicate with us and we have begun to share with him the many letters and cards that have been flooding in from all over the world."

The statement made no mention of whether he had spoken yet about the crash. His parents have denied all interview requests, and Rees-Jones' room is guarded closely by police.

It's not immediately clear how much Rees-Jones will remember. The shock of the accident and large doses of anesthesia used during extensive facial surgery might have hindered his memory.

All along, judicial and police sources have said another car in front of the Mercedes might have blocked its path. They appeared to give that theory less weight as the investigation progressed.

The latest revelations were the first to mention physical evidence — the pieces of brake lights and the traces of paint — supporting the theory of a second car. Also, a witness interviewed by police reported hearing the loud, screeching noise of a car slamming on its brakes just before the sound of the crash.

Scientists have determined the pieces of the tail light belonged to a Fiat, but have not yet determined the year or model, the police source said.

A judicial source confirmed pieces of the Mercedes' right headlight were found in the same place as the pieces of the Fiat tail light, several dozen yards behind the spot where the Mercedes hit the pillar. The traces of paint were found on shards of a side-view mirror casing on the Mercedes, the police source said.

Investigating Judge Herve Stephan has asked police to re-examine paint found on the wall inside the tunnel to see if it matches the Mercedes or another car, the judicial source added.

It was not immediately clear whether the shards and the paint on the wall came from the accident or were already present before the crash.

Nine photographers and a motorcycle courier are under formal investigation for manslaughter and failure to help people in danger. They haven't been formally charged.

Police have ruled out the possibility that the second car belonged to any of the paparazzi.

▶ Test results. Evidence leads investigators to consider the possibility that a second car might have been involved in Princess Diana's accident.

RYNING RECEIVES HONOR

Senior setter Devon Ryning was named Big 12 Player-of-the-Week for the week of Sept. 7. She averaged 14.67 assists per game last week, and was named MVP of the Boise State Triangular over the weekend. In the process of helping the Cats to three 3-0 victories last week, she became the first Wildcat ever to reach 4,000 career assists.

She leads the Big 12 with 14.36 assists per game. In a 3-0 victory over host Boise State, Ryning had 52 assists and 12 digs. She also recorded three service aces during game two of that match. For the week, she hit .318 with five blocks and 10 kills.

Ryning is the second Wildcat to be named Player-of-the-Week in three weeks, with sophomore outside hitter/middle blocker Dawn Cady earning the first honor of the season.

GOLFER SHOOTS CAREER LOW

Sophomore Brian Racette shot a 1-over-par 73 in the second round of the Falcon-Cross Creek Invitational Saturday. He led the team and finished 66th overall individually. Senior Matt Murdoch shot the low individual single round for the Wildcats with a 1-under-par 71 in the final round. K-State ended up in 20th place for the tournament.

California won the event, shooting a 1-over-par 865, while Nebraska's Jamie Rogers was the medalist with a 210 (69-71-70).

The Wildcats return to the course Sept. 22 and 23 at the Kansas Invitational in Lawrence.

CYCLING CLUB RESULTS

The K-State Cycling Club was in action last weekend in the Flint Hills Crash and Burn's Classic. In the Collegiate A Division, Danny Martin led K-State, finishing second. Derek Snyder was fourth, Brian Guild was seventh, Scott Wrenick was eighth, Jim Voight was 11th, and David Harrison was 12th.

In the Collegiate B Division, Kurt Thompson was fifth, Chad Holt was 13th, Theodis Gatlin was 15th, David Hethcoat was 19th, and Jason Bucher was 24th.

Jamie Rutler was the sole Wildcat in the Collegiate Women Division, finishing sixth.

The sports department at KSDB-FM 91.9 has added the broadcasting of K-State football and volleyball to the station's programming.

The addition of football games was made possible because of a contract agreement allowing DB92 to broadcast the games as long as no commercials are aired during the game.

WIBW-AM 580, the Wildcat Network, owns all rights to the games and has reserved all rights to broadcast commercials during the game.

DB92 can air announcements from station underwriters at the beginning and end of the games. The broadcast will be live for the duration of the game.

Brian Smoller, junior in electronic journalism and assistant sports director at DB92, said DB92 will carry all home games and perhaps away games.

"We are trying to get the Nebraska game or Oklahoma on the station, but that's not for sure," Smoller said.

Len Potillo, general manager of DB92, said if DB92 is unable to broadcast those away games, he wants to at least do live remotes from them.

This is also the first time K-State volleyball will be broadcast. DB92 chose to add the volleyball games to the format because the team has gathered so much attention in the past year.

Smoller said he would not be surprised if WIBW decided to broadcast the games also.

"It's a good source for listeners," Smoller said.

Potillo said he hopes having K-State volleyball on DB92 will bring more interest to the team and get more people to go to the games.

"If you haven't seen a volleyball game at Ahearn, it's a standard to do while you're at K-State," Potillo said.

K-State golfer strives to make U.S. Open

STORY BY JESS C. LOUK

When Jane Yi, K-State golfer, was 8 years old, her father handed her a golf club for the first time.

It was magic for Yi.

As her small hands wrapped around the grip of her father's club and her arms swung the club above her head in the clumsy way only new golfers' arms can, she knew she had found her niche in the world.

"One morning, I asked if I could try and hit the ball with his club. The club was huge, though. It was about bigger than me," Yi said. "I remember trying to hit the ball and whiffing a dozen times or so."

The frustration Yi felt that morning sparked an unquenchable thirst for perfection on the golf course. Yi now sees the Women's U.S. Open in her future.

"My ultimate goal is to win the U.S. Open," Yi said. "I'm very much a perfectionist."

Yi has come a long way since the days of hacking at the golf ball as a child. As a 10-year-old, she played in Topeka as the only girl in a coed youth golf league.

Yi won the league by winning five of seven tournaments.

"After that, I decided I was going to be one of those ladies on the pro tour going around playing golf and winning big tournaments," Yi said.

Yi now plays golf at K-State. In fact, she is one of the team's leaders. Yi qualified for each tournament and led the team in scoring in every tournament except one a year ago.

Not only did Yi lead the team in scoring, but she shot in the 70s five times last year and tied for second at the Southwest Missouri State Invitational.

But don't be fooled by Yi's impressive scores. She will be the first to tell you that her scores are more a direct result of her hard work than her natural talents.

"When I was 12 or 13, I decided I was going to go pro," Yi said. "The only way to do that is to keep working."

In this fall's first tournament, the Chip-N-Club Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., Yi's hard work was paying the dividends she has worked so hard for.

She came out and shot a 5-under-par 68 and was leading the tournament by one stroke after the first round.

But Yi was bitten by bad luck when a Nebraska bee stung her in the right arm. Her arm swelled to twice its normal size.

"It was the most exciting and the most disappointing tournament," Yi said. "That first round, I was playing so well. Then on that last day, that was a total blowout. It hurt so bad."

If Yi qualifies, she will get a chance to play through the sting in the Colorado Invitational in Boulder, Sept. 29 and 30.

"I think we can do really well in the Big 12 this year," Yi said. "It's just a matter of trying to be consistent with our game."

JANE YI is a golfer for the K-State women's varsity team. "When I was 12 or 13, I decided I was going to go pro," Yi said. "The only way to do that is to keep working."

Bad boys like Dennis Rodman, Albert Belle good for sports world

VIEWPOINT

CRESTON KUENZI

CRESTON KUENZI is a junior in computer engineering. You can send your e-mail to Creston at creston@ksu.edu.

I've got a riddle for you.

What do Dennis Rodman, Albert Belle and Andre Rison have in common?

Jerks? Yes. Controversial? Definitely. Bad for sports? Not so fast!

These villains, as I call them, are essential for sports to succeed. Imagine how entertaining it would be if all of the players were nice and squeaky clean like Cal Ripken Jr. and Grant Hill. It wouldn't be any fun at all.

The bottom line is, people tune in almost as much to see Rodman lose as they do to see Michael Jordan win.

Why else do you suppose guys like Albert Belle are allowed to throw baseballs at camera operators and forearms at second basemen? And why can Rodman headbutt referees and kick photographers', well, uh, mid-sections, without being suspended for any substantial period of time?

Basically, sports without villains is like "Star Wars" without Darth Vader, "Dallas" without J.R., or "Seinfeld" without Newman.

We, as a society, like the idea of having a clear-cut bad person to root against and a good person to cheer for.

Why do you think professional wrestling is so successful? Well, maybe that's a bad example.

Villains keep things interesting. In fact, I think it's gotten to the point that too many athletes are worried about having a good image because the clean-cut athletes like Tiger Woods get all of the endorsements.

I've decided sports needs more villains, so for all of you children out there with the potential to be the next Andre "Bad Moon" Rison, I'm starting a new institution. It's called the Kuenzi College of Villain Studies.

At KCVS, we teach the fundamentals of villainy by concentrating on five easy steps.

Step No. 1: First of all, you have to be really talented. Do you think Rodman would have lasted this long if he rebounded as well as he shoots? I think not.

Step No. 2: Show up late to games and practices and try to get on the bad side of your coach, the officials and, most importantly, the media. Let me emphasize that you have to be good enough that the coach won't sit you on the bench for the rest of the season when you act up.

Step No. 3: Feel free to use any expletives at any time, especially when the game is nationally televised. Bonus points for making obscene gestures to the crowd.

Step No. 4: Body piercings, body piercings, body piercings! Dyed hair is also good, along with any number of tattoos with a theme involving decapitation. If you get enough of this kind of stuff, you'll be host of your own show on MTV before you know it.

Step No. 5: The final step, and probably the most important one, is to be original. Do something that makes you stand out in a crowd of vermin. Spit in an umpire's face or bite your opponent's ear — oops, I guess those have already been taken.

I'm so confident that these five easy steps will put you well on your way to becoming the miscreant you've always wanted to become that I'm offering a money-back guarantee.

Sound too good to be true?

Just ask Washington Redskins wide receiver Michael Westbrook, a recent graduate of KCVS.

He followed the five steps and recently took a leap into the upper echelon of villains during the preseason, when he pummeled his own teammate into a bloody pulp for no apparent reason. Way to go, Michael!

You know, the more I think about it, it might be a good idea to make an addition to the steps to becoming a villain.

Step No. 6: Wait until you turn pro to implement the first five steps. I don't think the officials at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex would have quite the same appreciation for a good headbutt as I do.

FINLEY GRAVES is the new head of the Department of Accounting. Before working at K-State, Graves was a faculty member at the University of Mississippi.

Accounting head offers international twist

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

K-State's accounting students have a lot going for them after graduation.

In fact, the students were a big part of what convinced Finley Graves to accept the position as head of the Department of Accounting.

He knew how well the faculty worked together, and that with exceptional students there had to be a very innovative and progressive accounting program.

"Our accounting program is outstanding and one of the best in the region if not country," said Yar Ebadi, dean of the College of Business Administration.

To add to K-State accounting students' abilities, Graves will introduce international dimensions of accounting into the curriculum for the College of Business Administration, which is increasing the emphasis on international business.

Graves' international interests stem from an undergraduate degree in modern languages, a master's degree in modern German literature, and a doctorate in Germanic languages and literature.

That's just the beginning of Graves' education. While working as a tenured professor of German at the University of Alabama, he switched paths and started taking courses in accounting.

"I wanted to get the degree in German literature because I wanted the education," Graves said.

He turned to accounting because he knew some people who were successful in it and decided to give it a try.

After getting his master's and his doctorate in accounting, he became a certified public accountant in Mississippi. He was then recruited by his alma mater, the University of Mississippi, to teach accounting, where he went from assistant professor to full professor.

After a national search to fill the position of head of the accounting department, a committee narrowed it down to three candidates. This committee, composed of several faculty members, brought the candidates to K-State to make presentations. Graves was the best for K-State, Ebadi said.

"Finley will be a strong addition to an already excellent faculty," Ebadi said.

Graves is working on a proposal to integrate the international business dimension into the curriculum.

While K-State accounting graduates are placed 100 percent, the added international expertise of Graves will increase their job potential.

"Graves will take the Department of Accounting to another level of excellence," Ebadi said.

Search efforts continue for bodies, debris in crash

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WINDHOEK, Namibia — With hopes of finding survivors all but gone, search and rescue crews slogged though heavy fog and strong wind Wednesday for bodies and wreckage from the weekend crash of U.S. and German military planes.

An overnight search by three U.S. C-130s equipped with special night-vision equipment turned up only one small piece of wreckage, Lt. Col. Stony Steenkamp of the South African air force said Wednesday.

There has been no hint of any survivors since faint distress signals were detected Sunday and early Monday. Officials had no plans to stop the search, however.

The two planes were carrying 33 people when they vanished Saturday over the cold, treacherous waters off Namibia's coast. The German Tupolev 154 was going from Germany to South Africa, while the American C-141 was flying from Namibia, a coastal country northwest of South Africa, to Ascension Island in the south Atlantic.

Searchers have recovered only one body — that of an unidentified woman — which was taken to a morgue in Windhoek for examination. Three women were among the 24 people aboard the German plane. All nine aboard the American plane were men.

Germany was sending a specialized PC3-Orion search aircraft Wednesday, German Maj. Gen. Gerhard Back said in Windhoek. "We hope for better results," he said.

Searchers on Tuesday found debris from a U.S. cargo plane in the same place where they found remnants of a German aircraft, confirming that the two military planes collided about 115 miles west of Cape Fria on the Namibian coast.

The French frigate Florial had joined two Namibian vessels that have been collecting debris since Monday.

The Pentagon has said early information indicated the planes were flying at an altitude of about 35,000 feet when the crash took place. Air corridors often are shared, but planes traveling in opposite directions are supposed to fly at different altitudes.

Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon said the two aircraft were on different radio frequencies, although he did not know why.

O.V. Plichta, Namibia's minister for works, transport and communication, denied Namibia was at fault but said officials are "dismayed" at air safety elsewhere in Africa.

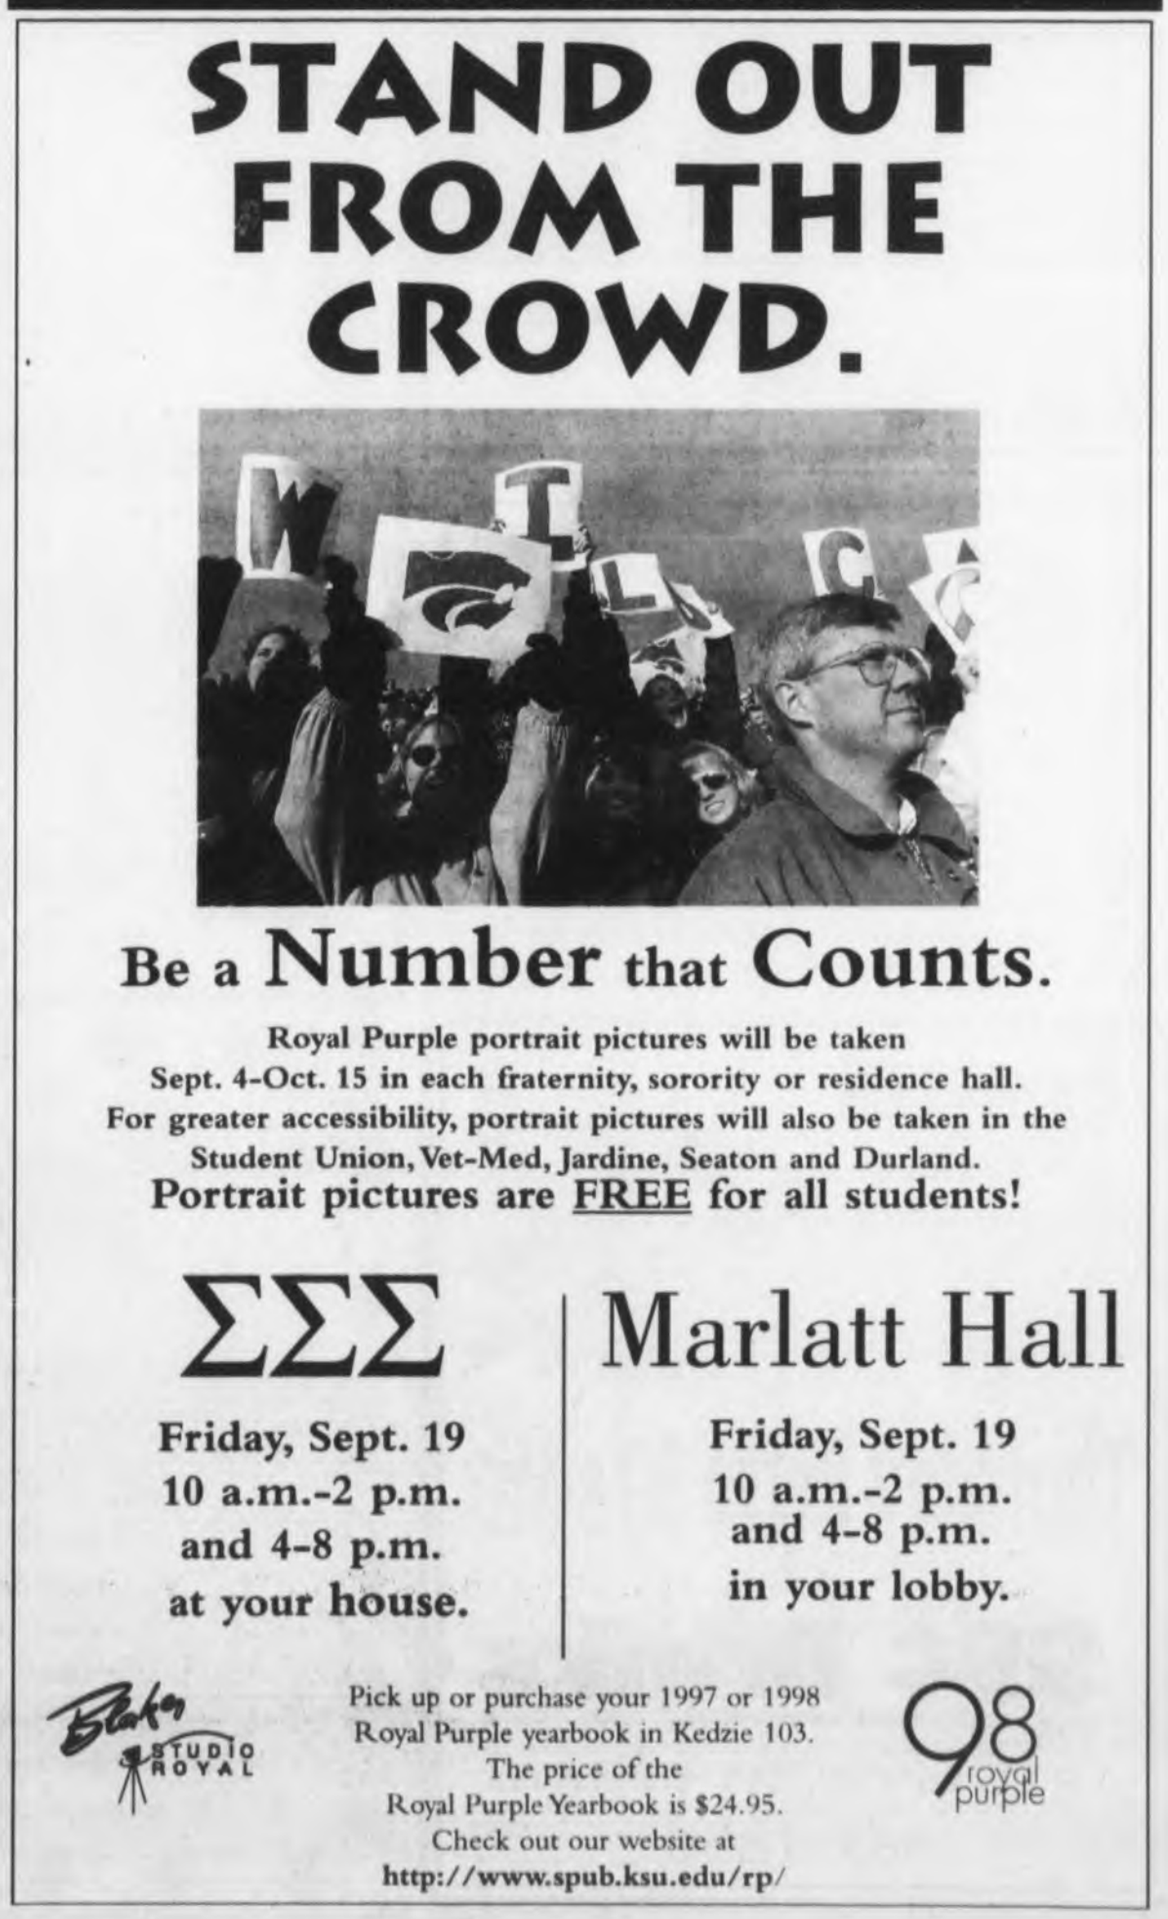
He cited a report several months ago by the International Federation of Airline Pilots Association and the International Airline Transport Association that declared large parts of the continent's air-traffic control system seriously deficient.

Officials also were trying to determine why the planes' disappearance was not reported to rescue officials for almost 24 hours.

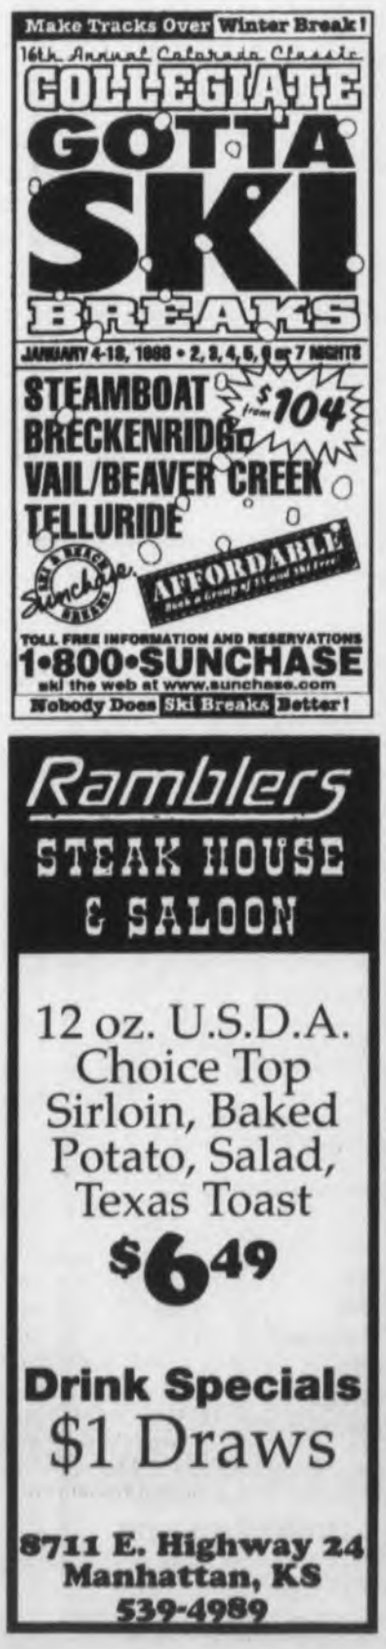
Jochen Sell, chief of air traffic control at Windhoek Airport, suggested the problem lay with air-traffic control centers in Luanda, Angola, and Niamey, Niger, for failing to pass on information about the German plane. He also said the Germans failed to file a flight plan with Windhoek for either the plane that crashed or the seven aircraft they subsequently sent to help in the search.

The Germans claimed Tuesday they filed a flight plan via telex the day before the crash with Namibia, Niger, Ghana and Angola and refiled it Saturday with Niger.

"We are certain that everything was transmitted properly from here," Defense Ministry spokesman Navy Capt. Hans-Joachim Liedtke said in Bonn.



Namibia said the only word it had that the Tupolev was coming was four weeks earlier in a diplomatic message from the German Embassy in Windhoek.



New club mixes feed for money

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff writer

Turning knobs and flipping buttons in the K-State Feed Mill is enabling the Feed Science Club to make a profit and gain a whole lot of work experience this semester.

Every Saturday morning, members mix horse feed, range cubes, and flaking corn and oats to sell to area business executives.

FEED SCIENCE CLUB SPENDS WEEKENDS RAISING MONEY AND GAINING EXPERIENCE

The activity serves as the club's fund raiser.

"We don't make very much money, but we do have a profit margin or we wouldn't be mixing the feed," said Jack Kliewer, junior in feed science and treasurer of the club.

On-the-job work experience is also a reason students participate.

"The idea of creating a club within the College of Agriculture for our members has actually been around for a while," Zach Stuchlik, president, said.

Initially, an attempt to set up a club was made by students in the feed science curriculum. However, there was not enough support from the faculty and administration. Students tried to establish the club again this past spring and gained the support needed.

"The reason why we wanted to start the club was for the benefit of freshmen and sophomores," Stuchlik said. "In the feed science curriculum, students do not gain much hands-on experience in the mill until they enter their upper-level courses. Our goal is to get them exposed and experienced."

Kliewer said the revenue generated from the feed sales is an important asset.

"We try to raise enough money to take nice field trips, so we don't have to rely on the department to pay for our expenses," Kliewer said. "We are still young and in the phase of establishing clients, so hopefully in the future our profits will grow."

One trip taken using money generated from feed sales was to Emporia, Kan., to tour Bunge Corp. and IBP Inc.

"This trip was beneficial for everyone, because we get ingredients and byproducts from both of these businesses to mix into our feed here at K-State. This trip allowed us to see where the products we use come from and how they are processed," Stuchlik said.

As far as the size of their production, the club bags feed on demand. Stuchlik said the club provides feed for agribusiness customers whenever they call.

"When we receive orders, people in our club just sign up and come to the mill to fill bags. How much work we do depends on how many orders we receive, and how much money we make depends on how many orders we fill," Stuchlik said.

Members also get a taste of real-life situations in the mill.

"We have a quality-control committee that makes sure we are following all the labeling, dating and testing regulations," Kliewer said. "We also have a marketing committee that is in charge of advertising in the community. We just try to make it as close to a commercial feed mill as we can."

Kliewer said the experience gained in the mill is an excellent education tool for all feed science students, regardless of their age.

"Most underclassmen don't have a clue how a feed mill operates. We urge them to come out for a laid-back Saturday morning, and we will teach them what they need to know and raise some cash at the same time."

The popularity and precautions of tattoos

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
staff writer

Whether a Pablo Picasso or Andy Warhol, people are crazed with the sensations of art.

The idea of viewing art is a thrill for some. For others, it's not so important. A rose, a mother's name, or even a set of crossbones are enough for one to express their creativity.

An ankle, a shoulder blade, or arm are places where people are pin-pointing the needle.

The art of tattooing has risen in popularity, with all types of customers and reasons to bring them back for a second visit.

"I call it putting your insides on your outsides," Kody Cushman, Rad-A-Tat tattoo artist, said.

Cushman has worked as a professional tattoo artist for Rad-A-Tat for two years.

"The popularity of tattoos has increased since I've worked here," Cushman said. "There are basically two types of people who get tattoos: those who get what they want, and it means something personal, and those who get what everybody else is getting."

People see tattoos on other people and come in to get the same tattoos done on them, Cushman said.

Cushman said that flower tattoos tend to be most popular with women, and men tend to like suns, tribal and solid black work. Customers are also welcome to bring in their own pictures, wall por-

FORMER NIRVANA GUITARIST KRIST NOVOSELIC. HE HAS A NEW BAND, A NEW SOUND AND IS IN THE SPOTLIGHT AGAIN.

Sweet 75

BY PHIL KELLUM

Nirvana broke up three years ago when Kurt Cobain committed suicide.

Dave Grohl has the Foo Fighters.

Now, Krist Novoselic has Sweet 75.

If you're expecting Nirvana part two, then you better look elsewhere. You're not going to find it here.

Combining the talents of Novoselic on electric 12-string guitar, Yva Las Vegas on bass and vocals, and William Rieflin on percussion, Sweet 75 is an unusual mix of rock, Latin folk and blues.

Music Review

It is pretty calm and laid back compared with Novoselic and Rieflin's previous bands, Nirvana and Ministry, respectively.

Novoselic met Las Vegas when she was hired to sing traditional South American folk songs at a birthday party of his a few years back. He loved her voice and later asked her to form a band.

The name of the band comes from a Theodore Roethke poem.

"Fetch" kicks the album off with Las Vegas' unique voice coupled with some unexpected guitar work from Novoselic. They work with each other well. Rieflin's spare beat pushes the song along.

"Lay Me Down" almost sounds like an outtake from the great band Grant Lee Buffalo, with its wonderful 12-string guitar.

With its faster, almost punk sound, "Bite My Hand" is one of the best songs on the album.

Las Vegas' venomous vocals rip through the music like an animal tearing apart raw flesh.

I especially liked how the guitar and drums crashed into the slower parts of the song.

"La Vida," which is Spanish for "Life," has a very Latin-influenced sound to it, including a five-piece horn section with a trumpet solo by legend Herb Alpert.

"Take Another Stab" is the first of two anti-relationship songs on this album.

Las Vegas sings lyrics like, "I used to be lovely. Now I'm not," and "I'm not loving you. I'm hating you."

It starts out slow and acoustic then turns electric at the choruses, yet the slow and eerie vibe sticks.

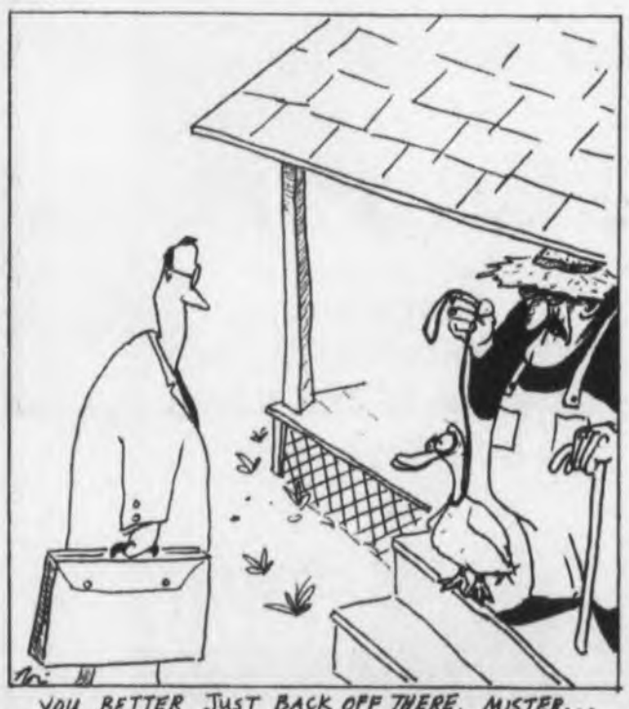
Rieflin throws in a military march-type drum beat to complete the eerie feel.

Las Vegas' anti-relationship diatribe follows in the next song on the compact disk, "Poor Kitty."

It's the faster of the two songs.

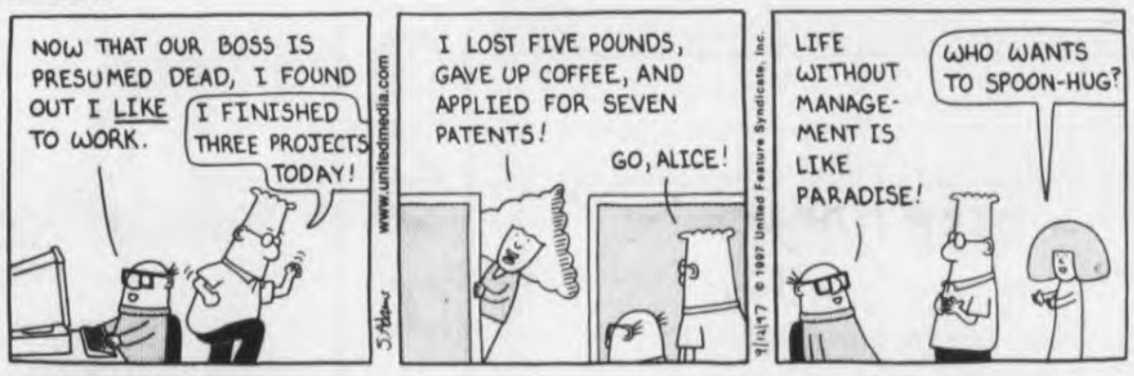
Novoselic's guitar playing on this song especially surprised me. With its fast and more punk rhythm, it would have been easy for him to play basic power chords, but he doesn't. He picks some unusual and different chord structures to give it a newer, more different sound.

Sweet 75 even goes country on one song. Well, pseudo-country.



On "Ode To Dolly," Las Vegas sings about how she wants to be a country singer and wants to be Dolly Parton.

With lyrics like, "I want to be a country singer. I want to ride a horse," who is going to doubt it? Not me.



The smooth Latin horns show up again in "Dogs," giving it a sound not unlike that of a '60s spy movie soundtrack.

Sufferbus celebrates new album release

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

The local band Sufferbus will rock the Wareham Opera House Thursday night in celebration of its new, self-titled album.

The doors will open at 7 p.m. with the music starting at 8 p.m. The Bent Scepters, a garage surf-rock band from Iowa, will lead the set. Ultimate Fakebook, a local group, will follow with a finale by Sufferbus. Tickets will be available at the door. The cost is $4 for those younger than 21 and $3 for people older than 21.

"We're working up some cover songs that we don't normally do," bass player Brian Harris said. "Just as a special treat."

"We're ready to throw a good show. We've got four or five musical surprises," drummer Ken Pingleton said.

The band includes two other members. Guitarist and vocalist Mitchell Leggs is a regular member of Sufferbus. Doug Minner, another guitarist, is a recent addition to the group.

Students display internship work in Seaton Hall

COLE EHMKE
staff writer

The semester work of a group of K-State architecture students is on display in Seaton Hall's Chang Gallery. The students spent eight months, from January to August, as interns for architecture firms around the country, learning their trade while on the job.

The interns were part of a program in the College of Architecture where college credit is earned for working 30 weeks in an architecture firm. In the program, interns work at entry-level positions in firms from small not-for-profits to large ones with international branches.

"The work displayed is either by them or the company they worked for," said Eugene Kremer, professor of architecture and program coordinator.

"The internship gives them the opportunity to work in their field," Kremer said.

Sarah Gibson, a fifth-year architecture student, was an intern this year with Cannon Design in St. Louis.

"I wanted to go to get some professional experience," Gibson said.

Gibson was looking to get her first experience in office work. She worked at a variety of jobs that kept her busy, including putting together presentations, making models, working at on-sites and on the computer. She liked the experience and has been offered a job with the firm.

Kremer said 30 weeks was enough time to settle in and become a junior member of the firm.

The college plays a minimal role in the internship. As part of their responsibilities, the students prepare a journal and an analysis paper while the college checks to make sure the intern doesn't spend most of their time doing running errands or making copies, Kremer said.

Their work is on display until Friday.

K-State Golden Key chapter receives Key Chapter Award

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff writer

At the International Convention Awards Luncheon Aug. 8 in Atlanta, Ga., the Key Chapter Award was presented to the K-State chapter of the Golden Key National Honor Society.

"Kansas State University is the only chapter to receive the award for 13 consecutive years," said Fred Fairchild, co-sponsor of Golden Key.

The Key Chapter Award is given each year to chapters who have been outstanding in five areas: communication, publicity, meeting management, chapter activities and leadership.

The top 15 percent of juniors and seniors in any field of study are invited to join Golden Key. The chapter is currently accepting applications and will hold its new member reception Oct. 19.

"One of our biggest strengths is we get a really good mix of people from different backgrounds," said Michelle Fore, president of Golden Key and senior in economics.

This diversity and teamwork is what brings home the Key Chapter Awards, Fore added.

Members of Golden Key are outside the Stateroom in the union until Friday to answer questions and give more information about the society.

For more details contact co-sponsors Fred Fairchild at 532-4090 or Ann Jankovich at 532-6976.

K-State-Salina appoints admissions representatives

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff writer

K-State-Salina recently appointed Deana Teske and Traci Cole as admissions representatives. They assumed their roles in August and will be responsible for developing a recruitment program for the College of Technology and Aviation.

"K-State has had an ongoing recruitment program that has been college-based," said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life.

President Jon Wefald wanted to incorporate Salina with the main campus for recruiting purposes.

A search committee, chaired by the dean of the college and consisting of students and faculty, chose Cole and Teske because of their ability to communicate their own positive K-State experiences.

Both are K-State graduates. Cole graduated in 1993 with a degree in kinesiology and Teske graduated in 1997 with a dual-degree in broadcast journalism and public relations.

"This is a great way to spend time with K-State doing what I love," Teske said.

Bosco added that in order to give Cole and Teske the same edge as main campus recruiters, they will be going through the same training programs.

"K-State-Salina is one of the best kept secrets in Kansas," Cole said.

Both admissions representatives said they will work hard to educate more students about that secret.

traits or posters to be tattooed.

"Our customers are usually eighteen years old, just starting college and away from mom and dad," Cushman said.

Customers can have a tattoo put on any part of the body, even toes and fingers.

All utensils are sterilized before the tattooing procedure is started. The artists show the disposable needles to their customers and explain the procedure. The average tattoo costs $40.

"Customers are always nervous. They tend to hold their breath. Some even pass out," Cushman said. "But we are trained to take care of our customers and try to make them feel relaxed and comfortable."

Cushman said for most customers, the procedure feels like a cat scratch or cutting yourself while shaving. She said it burns but is mostly dull and irritating.

Some customers return for more tattoo work.

Amy Mashburn, junior in biology, got her first tattoo in October 1995.

"I always wanted and have been fascinated with tattoos," Mashburn said. "Although, I don't want them all over my body."

"When I got my first tattoo it was just starting to become a fad. But, I thought it was a unique way to express my love of art," she said. "It makes me sad that tattoos have become such a fad, you know, the 'in thing' to do, but that's not the case with me."

Mashburn said each of her three tattoos has a special meaning that no one understands.

"One of my tattoos is in memory of my grandma. It's a way of remembrance," Mashburn said. "And my second tattoo emphasizes the meaning of the first one."

Not everyone cares for tattoos, but that won't stop Mashburn from getting one or two more.

Age, illness, medication and identification are all required before the tattooing procedure.

Regents to focus on salaries, tuition

Kansas Board of Regents

▶ Related story. The Kansas Board of Regents toured K-State and examined the technology level K-State possesses. See Page 1.

NATE JENKINS
staff writer

The chairman of the Kansas Board of Regents, Robert V. Talkington, took time Wednesday to give his impressions of K-State and discuss some of the upcoming challenges for the board.

Accompanied by the executive director of the regents, Stephen M. Jordan, Talkington is at K-State to attend the regents' meetings Wednesday and today at Farrell Library.

Speaking at a morning news conference, Talkington said after touring the campus, he visited with faculty members, classified staff and administrators. He had a chance to listen to their concerns and express some of the board's.

"They were concerned about salaries, and we've made salaries one of our highest priorities," Talkington said.

Paying faculty and staff the salary they deserve, keeping up with the high cost of modern technological equipment and keeping college affordable are priorities for the regents, Jordan said.

"That was really the centerpiece of the board's retreat this year," Jordan said.

Jordan said colleges and universities throughout the United States will be pressed to deal with these issues.

Keeping tuition affordable is a difficult issue, and the strategies to do so can be complex, he said. Instead of either allowing tuition to inflate or completely restricting it, Jordan said it is important to remain flexible.

Bringing technology to Kansas and implementing a qualified college admissions program in state high schools are issues that the regents planned to discuss at the meetings.

The board will submit their budget requests to the state legislature on Monday, but Talkington questioned the legislature's commitment to higher education.

"We have people in the legislature who think higher education has more money than we do, or what we say we do," he said.

BIOLOGY

liked the class.

"It's more self-directed," he said. "You get to go through it at your own pace."

The class meets twice a week. The first 15 minutes of the class are lecture. The next hour is devoted to working on the computer. The last 15 minutes are spent in discussion and interaction between students and professors.

The computer time is spent going through programs the students access through a Web page designed for the class by Decker. Along with the program come handouts with room for notes.

"Everything they do they are encouraged to write down," Decker said.

It's important for beginning biology students to understand the basic concepts, Decker said, which they will use throughout their careers. But most of the students are non-majors and might never see the material again, so a good understanding is necessary.

The class went through a test run during the summer with 80 students. It was Decker's chance to see how the class would work.

"My best measure of the success is that I never had a student ask if it would take the whole time," he said.

He added students are using the class time constructively and seem to be more enthusiastic about class.

Unger said faculty members hope to bring new learning environments to the 60 courses demanded by students. They are working on Expository English and Introduction to Sociology.

English would be a studio environment like biology but configured to meet the discussion and critique needed in English, she said. For the sociology course, officials are unsure of the learning environment model but do know that simulation, visualization, audio and video can be used effectively in the course, Unger said.

"We will also be looking at virtual reality as an option for teaching some of the material," she said.

REGENTS

Wilken said she could tell the student by the style of writing during the course's chat sessions. She said once the class is established, time will not be a problem.

Sylvia Robinson, regents member, said K-State seemed to be on track with the other regents schools.

"K-State is pretty comparable with the others," Robinson said. "The thing that is fascinating is the nature of the interaction with the students."

Ted Schroeder, professor of agricultural economics, participated in the demonstration.

"Students are really the beneficiaries," he said. "It is a complement to teaching methods by our faculty, not a substitute."

Harry Craig, also a board member, gave the faculty of K-State a lot of credit.

"I think that it is great how the faculty of this university are willing to try new things with their teaching methods," Craig said. "It will take a lot of time and effort on their part."

Craig said the university is right on pace for the future.

"But you must remember something about this technology," he said. "A tool is only as good as the one using the tool."

"We really like Doug. We've known him for years," Pingleton said.

"He's been in a band, and he knows how to be in a band," Leggs said.

The music style of Sufferbus is aggressive pop rock. "We try to be melodic but have a little crunch in there," Harris said.

He said the band has been on several compilation compact discs, but this is the first album it has released. With independent labels Brave New Records and Diablo Musica, it was officially released Aug. 12.

The band wanted to wait for its CD release party until people had a chance to hear about the album and students were able to settle back into college.

Sufferbus is ready to take a few steps up in the music scene, Harris said. It plans to use the album as a springboard to future gigs and to promote its tour.

"We're going to use this to try and tour around in November and December," Harris said. "We're well-rehearsed and ready for something to happen."

Las Vegas shows the listener where her roots lie, with "Cantos De Pilon," a traditional Venezuelan folk song.

Her vocals really shine on this track.

Novoselic straps on the accordion and Rieflin moves from behind the kit to behind the piano.

Even R.E.M.'s Peter Buck makes an appearance on this song playing the mandolin. It is a very delicate and wonderful song.

The album closes with "Oral Health." This track sounds like something R.E.M. might have done on its landmark "Out Of Time" album.

Sweet 75 has released an album that is very sweet indeed. Just don't expect any Nirvana covers.

Expect the unexpected.

Air Force ROTC celebrates 50 years

CADET LT. Col. Corey Hermesch, senior in computer science, slices the cake Thursday evening as part of the Air Force's 50th anniversary. A reception for the event was in the Military Science Hall.

The song "Happy Birthday" could be heard Thursday in Military Science Hall as members of the Air Force ROTC sang to commemorate the Air Force's 50th Anniversary.

Wing Cmdr. Gabrielle Dupree led about 80 cadets in the heat of the afternoon through an awards ceremony during the first part of the celebration. Awards were given to different flight groups for their accomplishments.

One of the contests, which was Thursday, was a group leadership problem, which was designed along the lines of a scavenger hunt. Clues are given to get to a certain building on campus, and as a team, the flight group must figure out which one it is and go there to pick up the next clue, Capt. Steven Dorfman said.

"It helps them work on group dynamics and teamwork," he said. "There are really no losers because it's a learning process."

The outside portion of the celebration ended with the singing of all four verses of the Official Song of the Air Corps.

The party then moved inside to the cadet lounge. A large cake decorated with the Air Force shield and insignias was waiting for the officers and cadets.

Traditionally, the oldest and youngest members of the Air Force share the duty of cutting the cake. This represents the passing of the old to the new. Col. Stan Weir, the oldest, and a freshman cadet shared the honors.

Weir, a 27-year veteran of the Air Force and the leader of the Air Force ROTC, addressed the crowded room before the cake was cut.

"We leave you a good Air Force, now you make it better," he said to the cadets. "This is a great outfit and a great group."

Joel Bieberle, senior in management information systems and Air Force ROTC cadet, said the Air Force has been good to him.

"It has given me a chance to become a leader," he said.

Kathy Hetland, freshman in mathematics, said she likes the atmosphere of Air Force ROTC.

"It is like a family. You can trust everyone," she said.

Traffic study to examine shuttle bus feasibility

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

The Council of Parking Operations decided to contribute $50,000 to the Manhattan Comprehensive Traffic Study, a campus traffic and parking evaluation.

Parking Services will contribute the money to the study so campus traffic and parking systems can be evaluated and made compatible with Manhattan's.

The council also proposed to study the feasibility of a parking garage and a shuttle system to solve present and future parking concerns.

In addition, Parking Services wanted the study to evaluate and compare the costs of implementation, life cycle operations and maintenance of a shuttle system and parking garage.

"I think what we want everyone to know is that if we want these services, it's going to cost some," John Lambert, director of public safety, said.

The council suggested the study recommend appropriate levels of user fees and charges required to operate these systems.

These proposals will be given to to the Manhattan City Commision on Sept. 30.

Lambert announced Parking Services has been working with K-State-Salina to improve the overall parking service operation.

Parking Services will be allocating funds to K-State-Salina to hire students and buy equipment and signs for the parking lots.

"It will be a different operation, but we will be working with them to help them through the process of updating their facilities," Lambert said.

The council also discussed ideas to improve the ticketing-appeals process.

"The reason it took so long to process these appeals was because there was an enormous volume of appeals," Darwin Abbott, director of parking services, said.

Abbott suggested appointing someone to sort through the large number of appeals to consider whether appeals had a legitimate basis.

Lambert also announced that more than 30 bike racks were distributed around campus this week to correct the lack of bicycle parking.

Regents approve proposal for center; no building planned

BRANDI HERTIG
staff reporter

The Kansas Board of Regents approved a proposal Thursday for a Plant Biotechnology Center, but don't expect to see a new building popping up.

The program involves people, not facilities, said Fred Schwenk, administrator of the proposed center.

Instead of a new building, the program will be housed under shared building space provided by participating departments and colleges.

"We're doing this bare bones, but I prefer to think of it as efficient," Schwenk said.

The program will join the efforts of the departments of plant pathology, agronomy, entomology, grain science and biochemistry, as well as the Division of Biology.

"I think it's a terrific concept that will be of great value in biotechnologial research," said Brian Spooner, director of the Division of Biology.

The cuts through the boundaries of the departments because it isn't specifically related to any one, he said.

The steering committee for the program consists of two plant pathologists, an agronomist, a biologist and a biochemist, Marc Johnson, dean of the College of Agriculture, said.

"It goes across two colleges, two agencies and four departments," Johnson said.

The benefits of the program will be multifold, Schwenk said. It will allow K-State to be more competitive for grants, entice high quality faculty and graduate students as well as help current faculty members enhance their teaching.

No new monies will be involved in the program. Rather, funds have been redirected from new faculty positions and an internal competitive grant program, Schwenk said. Seed and chemical companies will be looked to for help in sponsoring the research.

With initial research focusing on wheat, the program's mission statement, "Using biotechnology to add quality and value to Kansas products," will be put to use. Eventually, the research might extend to other Kansas crops, Schwenk said.

The wheat research will center around genetic improvements, such as building resistance to disease and insects, Johnson said.

Board discusses new policies, programs in academic affairs

Kansas Board of Regents

SHEYENE FOSTER
staff writer

New programs and policies in academic affairs were largely the focus of discussion at the Kansas Board of Regents meeting on Thursday.

An initiative that will give institutions more freedom in the academic reviewing process was explained by John Welsh, regents director of academic affairs.

"Each institution would be reviewed a minimum of every five years and a maximum of every eight years," Welsh said.

Some board members were concerned the change in policy might give institutions too much leeway. However, Welsh explained that the future of this initiative is tentative and will be dependent upon cooperation of the regents institutions.

Determining factors include the quality of plans submitted to the board in March and the level of rigor the universities use in reviewing their own programs. Welsh did not foresee any problems with the new reviewing system.

"This board has built a very high level of trust with the institutions," Welsh said.

Another issue that caused some controversy was that of distance education. Revisions were made that would remove many limitations on what courses can be offered by the universities and where they can be offered.

"We believe we're moving forward here," Welsh said. "Geographic jurisdiction would be removed. There would be an open market or a free market that would be mediated. All of the programs would have to be mediated to qualify."

Related to this issue, the board also discussed the Western Governors Council and its "Virtual University." President Jon Wefald, Welsh and others were among those in support of becoming involved with the council.

"Now is the time for Kansas to become involved in the Western Governors' Council," Wefald said. "I hope that we can continue pushing for that."

However, there was concern that by allowing universities to offer 100- and 200-level courses and expanding virtual university programs, there would be too much overlap between institutions. Welsh disagreed with this assumption.

"My expectation is that once we get beyond geographic divisions, we will have a lot more communication between institutions on cooperative planning and specialization," he said.

The final portion of the session on matters relating to academic affairs was devoted to a report on the implementation of qualified admissions.

Since the implementation of state admissions requirements for regents institutions, Welsh said he has felt good about the importance of qualified admissions.

"The board and universities have accomplished very much," he said.

According to Welsh, the board is working with high schools to compile and evaluate a number of high school courses. This will ensure that high school courses meet the qualification standards. Welsh said this will help in advising students and ensure more equal treatment of students in applying for admission.

In addition to these academic affairs, the board also addressed facilities, fiscal and policy-related issues during the meeting.

Faculty Senate executive session to consider dropping requirement

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

The proposed removal of Kinesiology 101 from general education requirements could soon be a reality.

K-State Academic Affairs had an open meeting last Tuesday in the Union Stateroom so students and faculty could voice their concerns. Academic Affairs Chairman Don Felton said response was generally in support of dropping Principles of Physical Fitness from the list of general education requirements.

"Basically, there was no one in opposition to dropping it," Felton said.

The next step will be for Faculty Senate to have an executive session, during which it will likely add the issue to the group's agenda, he said.

If added, the group will decide the future of the course at its Oct. 14 meeting. The course is still a requirement for graduation despite not being on the line schedule for fall 1997.

New AIDS cases in U.S. drop for first time in epidemic

ATLANTA — New cases of AIDS in the United States fell 6 percent last year, the first drop since the epidemic began in the early 1980s, and the government credits powerful new drugs.

The same period also showed a drop in AIDS deaths, a trend reported by the government earlier this year. Deaths from the disease fell 23 percent, from an estimated 50,140 in 1995 to about 38,780 in 1996, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention said Thursday.

In 1996, an estimated 56,730 people were diagnosed with AIDS, down from the 60,620 new cases in 1995, the CDC said.

The CDC said powerful drugs, such as protease inhibitors, are apparently preventing infection with the AIDS virus from progressing to full-blown AIDS, especially in patients who start taking the medication early.

The CDC does not have information on the rate of HIV infection, which would give a far better idea of how successful the fight against AIDS has been.

Man ordered to pay $243,000 for breaking up marriage

RALEIGH, N.C. — A department store manager who had an affair with an employee was ordered to pay $243,000 for stealing another man's wife.

The jury in the alienation-of-affection lawsuit Wednesday ordered David Nickerson to pay the amount to Jacques Moryoussef, the husband of Wendy Moryoussef.

Jacques Moryoussef said he found letters in his wife's dresser drawer detailing sex his wife and Nickerson had in a storeroom and on a desk at the store.

The jury of seven men and five women ordered Nickerson to pay $100 for each day since the affair started in 1994 and $50,000 for committing adultery. The jury also awarded Jacques Moryoussef $100,000 in punitive damages.

Nickerson and Wendy Moryoussef did not defend themselves at the trial.

North Carolina is one of the few states that allow spouses to sue someone for breaking up a marriage.

In August, a jury in Burlington ordered Margie Cox Hutelmyer to pay $1 million for breaking up the marriage of her former boss, Joseph Hutelmyer.

Study suggests how anti-cancer gene makes dangerous cells die

NEW YORK — Scientists say they have taken a leap toward figuring out how a cancer-suppressing gene makes dangerous cells die.

The work might help researchers understand how radiation therapy and some chemotherapy kill cancers.

The gene is called p53. When it becomes active, it can block a cell's attempt to reproduce itself or make it commit suicide. In these ways, it can keep a cell with damaged DNA from creating a cancerous tumor.

To study how p53 causes cell suicide, researchers from Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore identified 14 genes that p53 turns on before suicide occurs.

Further work suggested that several of these genes raise the level of substances that damage cell structures called mitochondria. Calcium and proteins leak from the mitochondria, which make other proteins go to work to complete the cell suicide, the researchers suggest.

Counseling Services offers ideas, strategies to help stressed students

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Two tests, a paper and an oral presentation are due tomorrow.

Even with the best preparation, this is a recipe for a late night and a lot of stress.

"One of the things we see is a lot of freshmen coming in struggling to adapt to college life," Dorothy Farrand, a clinical psychologist at University Counseling Services, said. "As you get further up, I think that the academic pressure grows."

Tests are some of the biggest stressers, Farrand said. There is also no way to avoid the test, so students must learn to avoid the stress — or at least manage it.

"The irony is that in a test situations you can neither fight nor flee it. You've got to calm yourself down so you can perform," Farrand said.

As students become more involved with campus organizations and work, the added pressure takes a toll on their bodies, Farrand said.

The body uses somatic signs such as headaches, body aches and tension to indicate when it needs to slow down.

The mind can also indicate stress through symptoms. Depression, insomnia and a lack of appetite are common reactions to high stress levels.

Farrand said some common ways student react in stressful situations are actually stress inducing. Some students handle stress by staying up later. However, they are usually tired the next day and do not perform well. This brings more stress.

Using a daily planner is also important in reducing stress and prioritizing time usage.

"There are all the planners out there actually, because they work," Farrand said.

The way time is used is also important. Students who plan to study for two hours but spend an hour getting ready or taking phone calls are not making the most of their time.

The counseling center can help students organize and plan more effective uses of their time. This also includes evaluating the program after it has been used for a period of time and modifying the plan to make it better.

Farrand said the key to stress management is being proactive. Students should plan their time, stay organized and listen to their bodies.

When students start to feel stressed out, there are a variety of ways to relieve stress before it becomes a problem.

One way to relax the body is through breathing exercises and other practices known as brief strategies. Brief strategies are one and two minute sessions that are done frequently during the day.

Breathing exercises are one of the easiest brief strategies. Taking deep breaths forces the body to slow down. Students should also imagine breathing out the tension.

Another brief strategy involves muscle control. Students should tense their bodies and take a deep breath, then relax and breathe out.

"You've got to consciously let go, relax the muscles in your body," Farrand said.

Other options offered at the counseling center include stress management workshops, individual sessions, biofeedback and training through the semester.

Students interested in stress management techniques should contact Counseling Services at 532-6927 or go to the Lafene 232.

When work piles up, students survive by using time management, exercise

MATT KREPS
staff writer

One of the most common stress factors in college life is the test. Or multiple tests.

"It seems like all of them land on the same week," Courtney Dunbar, sophomore in family studies and community service, said.

Balancing Classy Cats, classes and other activities creates a lot of opportunities for stress, Dunbar said.

Her solution is to just get away. She said she likes to take walks or go out for a short time to relax before studying. She also dropped a class to create more time for herself.

"I wasn't sitting down at all. I was always on the run," Dunbar said. "I'm in no hurry to get out of here."

Jessica Sipes, a senior in marketing and human resources management, said group projects were her biggest source of stress.

"You have to find a time when everybody can meet," Sipes said.

When the work piles up, Sipes said she just keeps working until everything is finished. She organizes her time as well as possible to finish projects ahead of schedule. If not, she has a long night ahead.

Eric Taylor, freshman in finance, said his grades were the biggest source of stress. His solution is straightforward. "I take a break, that's about it," Taylor said.

For graduate students, often it is the activities rather than the classes that cause stress. Ken Slater, a graduate student in student counseling/personal services, said juggling an internship, assistantship and classes is hard work. Mostly, he worries about meeting deadlines.

Slater does not use a planner, he has a routine he follows.

"I just kind of go at it," he said.

Slater also uses exercise to relieve stress. A workout clears his head and makes him ready to sit down to work, Slater said.

Manhattan plans for Rollin' Down the River

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff writer

The first Rollin' Down the River Festival starts today in Junction City.

The festival will be at Fort Riley Saturday and Sunday and in Manhattan Sunday night before it travels along the Kaw River from Junction City to Kansas City. This is the first weekend of the month-long festival that will stop at certain cities and towns along the river. The Kaw Valley Heritage Alliance (KVHA) planned the festival to promote a sense of community, kinship and place in the Kaw Valley.

The Fort Riley events will be at the First Territorial Building this weekend, with crafts, food booths, music, and various shows presented by the KVHA. Also, there will be river float trips Saturday and Sunday.

Rhonda Janke, associate professor and extension specialist, is helping with the float trips. She said she has been canoeing the Kaw all summer and is familiar with the river.

"It's a beautiful, gentle river, and it's easy to take the kids on," Janke said. "I'm glad to see people enjoying and celebrating the river."

Janke said there has been a lot of planning involved in the festival.

"I've seen the anticipation and excitement about the festival grow over the past year, and I'm real excited about it," Janke said.

She is also helping with a booth for Sustainable Manhattan, a project that is working to improve the community.

"This is the first time for people from Manhattan to see what Sustainable Manhattan is and to get them plugged into it," she said.

Manhattan activities will start Sunday afternoon in City Park with an opening by Manhattan mayor Bruce Snead. A presentation by Jack Gladstone, Kaw leader, will follow.

There will also be a dedication to the Klataske Conservation Easement at 2:30 p.m. and Tuttle Creek Reservoir Spillway tours at 2 and 3:30 p.m.

Monday will include a presentation of Kaw River Valley history at Manhattan High School at 1 p.m., afternoon tours of Wildcat Creek outdoor lab, another tour of Tuttle Creek Spillway at 7 p.m., and a presentation and panel discussion of the 1951 flood at Manhattan High School.

Tuesday, there will be a presentation at the Manhattan Center for the Arts at noon, Kaw River tours, and a Tuttle Creek Spillway tour at 7 p.m. The Manhattan festival events will conclude at the Riley County Historical Museum at 7:30 p.m.

Roundabouts, unprotected crosswalks threaten pedestrian safety

The choreographed tango between the common pedestrian and local street traffic is increasingly becoming a dance of death.

Every day, students take a little more risk crossing the street at unprotected crosswalks, and drivers tempt fate a bit more when swerving to miss a roundabout.

Just who determined the roundabout — that circular, medieval torture device laying smack in the middle of our intersections — as the design answer to unsafe neighborhood driving?

If common driving habits are any indication, drivers not only don't take the time to read the confusing, surreal arrow signs pointing the directions of the intersection, but they ignore them altogether. Instead, they create their own driving conditions, cutting across corners illegally or, better yet, running over the roundabouts.

And to see the city planning to install a mega-roundabout at Claflin Road and North Manhattan Avenue is most discouraging. It's hard to believe how this confusing solution to traffic congestion could actually improve matters for pedestrians and drivers.

The Student Senate Governmental Relations Committee is beginning to address some of these problems, especially the need for a stoplight and pedestrian crosswalk at Thurston Street and Manhattan Avenue. The city has stalled too long on Manhattan Avenue and needs to begin seriously addressing pedestrian issues.

The committee is also supporting the addition of a stoplight for pedestrians at Jardine Drive and Denison Avenue, another area that needs attention. The committee, however, should rethink its reasons for opposing a stoplight at Mid Campus Drive and Claflin Road. The traffic here is inexcusable.

Kudos to the committee for opposing the roundabout plan, too.

This committee's actions should be supported by all of Student Governing Association and taken seriously by the Manhattan City Council.

Remembering a friend

THE STORY OF A BOY AND HIS DOG

Wolfen
1981-1996

VIEWPOINT

KELLY FURNAS

KELLY FURNAS is a sophomore in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Kelly at krf5663@ksu.edu.

I can see Wolfen now ... rolling through clouds of snow.

As if it were yesterday, I can vividly picture him running across a golden field of grain.

I remember him howling at the moon.

But most of all, I remember the effect Wolfen had on a young boy.

When we first got Wolfen, he was only a couple of months old. My mother, my sister and I had an entire litter to choose from, but we picked Wolfen because of his bright blue eyes. A Siberian Husky, he was vaguely reminiscent of the wolves in the 1980 thriller "Wolfen." That would become his name, although his personality didn't fit the part.

My parents hadn't exactly discussed the family addition beforehand. I'll never forget the look on my father's face when he came home that night.

"Look at the feet on that dog," were his first words. His mind was already reeling years into the future, when Wolfen would grow into those disproportionate paws. But as the whole family played with and got to know our new friend, I think my father became more attached to the size of Wolfen's heart.

Over the years, Wolfen proved to be a confidant and a companion. Whether we were playing soccer or he was taking me for a walk, it seemed we were inseparable.

Sometimes to a fault.

By the time I had reached sixth grade, Wolfen was no stranger to running away. Actually he was just exploring — he was born to run. But one day Wolfen got out while I was at school. Events like this had happened before, but usually he had waited until the evening to return. This time, apparently, Wolfen had become hungry and needed to get back in the house.

It was uncanny. Wolfen not only knew where my school was, but he knew what classroom I was in. How he got in the building I don't know, but he just came prancing in the room and walked over to me. My teacher gave me permission to take him home, but on our way out, we were confronted by the humane society. Apparently, someone had reported that a stray dog was harassing the students. Fortunately, a teary-eyed 12-year-old was no match for the dog-catcher.

Wolfen wasn't always running away, though. Some of our best times were at home.

Whenever I was playing the piano in our basement, Wolfen would come listen to me. He would walk up beside me, look at me and the piano with approval, and lie down. Sometimes he would fall asleep. Other times he would stare blankly across the room. I would have never guessed that dogs enjoyed hearing someone banging chords and fumbling for keys. Wolfen loved it.

Wolfen loved the entire family. My mother and he were especially close. It took weeks after my mother's death for me to realize how much he missed her. He understood that she had been sick for a long time, but still he would walk in and out of rooms with a "Where's Mom?" look on his face. For such a remarkably human soul, Wolfen had no counseling and no one to explain what had happened. He just knew he had lost a friend.

That was really the beginning of the end for Wolfen.

The loss of a family member is tough on everyone, but the loss of a mother is extremely tough on a household. My father, my sister and I had a hard time keeping the house in order, and Wolfen became more difficult to take care of.

The saddest part of our relationship with Wolfen came when we moved. The new home just wasn't made for a dog.

For the first time, our family had really nice furniture and a matching color scheme. Sometimes I joke with people and tell them that the reason we eventually gave Wolfen away was because he didn't match our house. The truth is, Wolfen didn't match our lifestyle.

Our born-to-run dog was now a chained-up nuisance in our fenceless yard. Feeding him was a chore, as was taking him for walks. He became less of a family member and more of a pet.

But by the time I realized what I was doing to my old friend, it was too late. An ad had appeared in the classifieds: "Free to good home. Blue-eyed Siberian Husky." My selfishness would become my loss. I would lose my best friend forever.

The night before we gave Wolfen away, I went outside to be with my friend. I guess I talked to him for awhile, but then I just put my arms around him for the longest time. Unlike when my mother died, I don't think he had any idea what was happening. He just knew he needed to comfort the boy.

And, like so many times before, Wolfen was there for me.

Whip out the camouflage and cut-offs to get a job

CAREER FAIR SHOULD EMPHASIZE THE PERSON BEHIND THE GLOSS

VIEWPOINT

BRANDI HERTIG

BRANDI HERTIG is a sophomore in print journalism and English/ creative writing. You can send your e-mail comments to Brandi at blh0377@ksu.edu.

I just had to go to the bathroom.

Sadly, the trek between the Union Stateroom and the nearest toilet was a particularly arduous one that day — that day being the day when hundreds of K-Staters, well-coiffed and stuffed into their Sunday finery, crammed into the K-State Student Union to impress the likes of potential employers.

The fact that this whole thing was called a Career Fair bothers me to begin with. As noted sophomore in political science Chris McLemore said, "I don't go to the fair to get a job. I go to the fair to throw up on the Zinger and eat funnel cakes. Maybe if there's time, I'll take in the butter sculpture, the pig races and a little Spandex."

And never were truer words spoken.

But, to be sure, it's not the actual Career Fair or the fact I had to go all the way to the bowling alley to find a toilet that struck something funny in me. It was just what it brought out.

I saw these people, who on any other day would be wearing much more comfortable attire and acting in a manner that would be more in tandem with their real personalities. For some reason, the real people behind the snappy ties and Aqua Net weren't good enough to present to these potential employers.

A few weeks ago, an alumnus dropped by one of my journalism classes to relate his experiences with job-hunting to us. I'm not sure why I was surprised when he replaced adages like "Just be yourself" with more modernized tidbits like "You just have to kiss a lot of ass."

So, not only do we have to drop a cool $20,000 and spend several years of our ever-withering youth to obtain these hard-earned degrees, we also have to be sure to enroll in Ass Kiss 101 before graduation. Nice.

Where does one begin to trace the origin of wearing stuffy, itchy garb to impress people in power? For instance, a pair of suntan, control top, reinforced-toe Legg's pantyhose is not a piece of clothing I'd kick around in just because I like having that uncomfortable bit of overhang squishing about all damn day. I think this is a point women (and maybe even a few special men) the world over can agree upon.

So why in the world do we all expect each other to climb into these special icons of our determination and pretend to like it?

When we were little, we had Sesame Street and Captain Kangaroo telling us it's what's inside that counts. Now that we're big, we have everyone else, who are pretty much the antithesis of any children's program, telling us we have to buy expensive clothes that have that extra packet of buttons attached if we want to get anywhere in the world.

But, to be completely honest, I'd run around all day in the Legg's if I could just be myself. However, if I were to do that, the second part of the job-gettin' equation (dry-clean-only plus petroleum-jelly-on-the-teeth equals job) would be missing, and thus rendered useless.

I'm not saying next year everyone should show up to the Career Fair in their Huey Lewis and the News 1984 world-tour concert T-shirt with their résumé scrawled in crayon on a paper bag.

More emphasis should be put on the person behind the gloss, not on how well that person can doctor themselves up to look all pretty. If someone ultimately gets hired, I'm sure they'd like to go back to being themselves sooner or later, rather than filling the corporate mold for the rest of their career.

Perhaps it's a little too idealistic for any career-driven American's palate. Maybe we do need that little extra polish and paint to hide what's really lingering underneath. Maybe what's underneath is unhappiness at the unbroken circle of reality. Only, no one can take the initiative to break out of the pattern.

Dean leaves to work in private sector

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff reporter

The dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine has announced his plans to leave K-State in mid-January to work in the private sector, prompting a national search for his replacement.

Ronald Marler made his announcement Sept. 8.

Marler's plans are to become the director of pharmaceutical development for Midwest Research Institute, Kansas City, Mo.

"This is an exciting opportunity," Marler said. "It would be my wish and our goal for the research group to work with smaller companies in developing novel therapies in some very focused market niches such as AIDS, cancer, immunotherapy and serious infections."

Marler has been dean of the college since 1994. He received his bachelor's and doctoral degrees in from K-State.

He was an instructor in the department of surgery and medicine — now clinical sciences — and the department of pathology during the 1970s at the university.

Marler spent time working in industry before being named the director of global drug safety in January 1992 and then vice president in April 1993.

In his time as dean, he said he has seen many changes within the college.

"It's been our refocusing on students and making them successful, preparing them for careers as young veterinarians. That has been the major accomplishment over the last three years," Marler said.

The administration is beginning its search for Marler's replacement, but Provost James Coffman said he is saddened to see Marler leave.

"I was extremely sorry to hear of his resignation," Coffman said. "In fact, I tried my best to talk him out of it."

Coffman said he understood Marler's decision though.

"He's done great things for the university, and I'm sorry to see him leave," he said. "But he does have a great opportunity, and I can't blame him for taking it."

The selection process for a new dean, which is already under way, is divided into several steps, Coffman said.

The first step is to establish a search committee, which Coffman hoped to have completed this week.

The committee members include a dean from another college, people from the private sector of veterinary medicine, a K-State student and a classified university employee.

After the search committee has been selected, the second step is to make an announcement of the open position through advertising, Coffman said.

Once candidates are located, the process proceeds with personal interviews.

The selection committee will make its decision from there.

Riley County programs awarded grants by Stovall

KRIS ROBL
staff reporter

Two Riley County assistance programs were awarded state grants Monday by Attorney General Carla Stovall.

Stovall announced that $307,626 would be allocated to 24 Kansas programs aimed at child abuse and crime victims.

The two Riley County programs receiving grants were the Sunflower Court Appointed Special Advocates Project and the Crisis Center of Riley County Inc.

The money is allocated from the State Crime Victims' Assistance Fund and is generated from 50-cent district and municipal court docket fees.

Stovall said the purpose of the program was to provide funds for ongoing operating expenses of programs, which provide temporary emergency shelter for victims of child abuse and neglect; counseling and assistance to those victims; educational services directed at reducing the incidence of child abuse and neglect; and diminishing its effect on victims.

Stovall and an appointed committee will decide how much will be allocated out to each program or agency. Money is allocated to these programs based on their needs.

"In order to qualify for these grants, programs must meet committee guidelines," said Mary Horsch, director of communications for Stovall.

The Sunflower CASA Project, originally the Riley County CASA, was started in 1988. The program acts as an advocate for children in the court system. CASA gets acquainted with the child and family. It assists in supervised visitations between the parents and children.

"We are a voice for children in the court system," Melanie Brockington, CASA executive director, said. "We are a third party for the court that helps a judge decide where to place a child."

This year, CASA will be receiving $4,500 in state grants.

"The number allocated each year is usually about the same for us," Brockington said.

CASA is also partially supported by the City of Manhattan an the United Way of Riley and Geary counties.

The Crisis Center of Riley County Inc. received two grants of $18,700 and $30,000. The first grant will be used for crime victims in Geary County. The second grant will be used to help witnesses or victims of abuse and violence. Some of the money will also be used to promote the Circles of Affection program.

"This program was awarded the most innovating program for children in 1995 by the National Association of Attorney Generals," said Sandy Barnett, executive director of the Crisis Center.

"Right now, we are trying to promote this project to crisis centers in other states," Barnett said.

The program is designed to assist

Scientist discusses research of dark matter

ANDREA COREY
senior staff writer

Dave Schramm spends his time trying to find something he can't even see.

Schramm is a scientist — a professor and the vice president of research at the University of Chicago. He oversees a national laboratory in suburban Chicago, and is also chairman of the National Research Council Board on Physics and Astronomy. He researches dark matter.

Dark matter can be described as the stuff in between the stuff we see. It doesn't shine like a star but occupies space in the universe.

"You know the mass is there, you just can't see it," he said.

Schramm spoke Thursday night about dark matter as part of a series of speakers sponsored by the Department of Physics. His presentation was titled "Shadow of Creation: The Dark Matter of the Universe."

Schramm said there are three ways to measure for dark matter.

One of those ways is to measure cluster galaxies, which he described as about 1,000 galaxies whirling around.

When they are measured, the mass of the galaxies can be separated from the rest of the mass in the cluster.

And while most might expect removing the mass of those galaxies would result in nothing, nature doesn't follow human logic.

When those galaxies are removed, something is left over.

That something is dark matter.

"The bulk of the mass is dark. It's not shining, it's not visible-like. It's there, but what is it?" he said.

Schramm said the discovery and research of dark matter is like being on the edge of a new renaissance.

"Cosmology has moved from 30 to 40 years ago where it was closer to religion," he said. "Now it's a science."

"We're no longer where it's wild speculation," he said. He added that science now is about quantifying theories.

Schramm said the next generation of satellites, which will be launched in 2000 and 2005, will help quantify scientists' ideas.

"We should be able to get answers to the cosmological questions," he said.

Bill Reay, distinguished professor of physics at K-State, said his research is generally moving in the direction of what Schramm studies. Reay studies neutrinos, point-like particles that could or may not have mass.

Reay said in an area the size of the tip of a finger, there could be about 200 neutrinos traveling through. Reay is trying to find out what neutrinos are made of.

"You spend your life studying these things. If you win, great. If you lose, well, it's an interesting way to spend a life."

▸ VOLLEYBALL TEAM FACES CONFERENCE champions in Maryland tournament.

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

In the first three weeks of the season, the K-State volleyball team has been nearly unbeatable.

The Wildcats have won seven of their first eight matches, with the only loss coming to then-No. 11 Hawaii.

In fact, during the seven victories, K-State has won 21 of 22 games.

But this weekend, when the Cats play at the Maryland Tournament, they're expecting their most difficult fight so far this season.

"I think this weekend is going to be really tough, by far the toughest tournament this far, in the respect that it's not going to be an easy opponent and then a tough opponent," senior setter Devon Ryning said.

"It's going to be three tough opponents that we have to play. I think we're just going to have to work hard on playing hard every game and staying in it mentally," she said.

K-State, which has played inconsistently lately, will probably have to play consistently to remain competitive today.

"I think if we can go out and play well and play steady, we'll be all right," assistant coach Jeff Grove said.

At noon, the Cats play Maryland, the host school.

Maryland won the Atlantic Coast Conference championship and advanced to the NCAA Tournament last season. The Terrapins lost some starters, but they replaced them with quality players, Grove said.

K-State will try to play a quick match against Maryland because the Cats play South Carolina at 4 p.m. However, Grove said he doesn't expect the Cats to finish their opponents off quickly.

He said the teams in the tournament are not three-game pushovers, as University of Texas-Arlington, Wichita State, Eastern Washington and Boise State have been lately.

"We need to be prepared to go the distance," he said.

When the Cats play South Carolina, they will try to even up the Gamecocks' record against Big 12 schools.

South Carolina beat Texas Tech in four games earlier this season.

"It's going to be our toughest tournament of the season," Grove said. "We're playing three very solid teams. This will be a good test for us as we come up on Big 12 play."

Saturday, the Cats take on George Mason. Grove expects a competitive match, but he said the Cats will have to adjust to George Mason's leading hitter.

She's left-handed, has power and hits with a lot of top spin, which causes the ball to drop early.

"They try to set her up a lot," Grove said. "She can hit it anywhere on the court."

While South Carolina might highlight one player in its attack on K-State, Grove expects a team effort from K-State, as well as leadership from Ryning, the team captain.

"Devon's going to have to set a great match," he said.

"But we're not going to be able to rely on one player. One person is not going to be able to carry us. Everybody's going to have to have a solid match."

Women's tennis team set to play only home match of season

▸ 4 TEAMS COME TO town for the Travelers Express Invitational this weekend.

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

The K-State tennis team will have its only shot at showcasing its talent in Manhattan this fall in the Travelers Express Invitational on Saturday and Sunday.

Last year's first team All-Big 12 selection in both singles and doubles, Yana Dorodnova, said it is important to have a good performance at home.

"It's our only opportunity to show Manhattan how good we are," Dorodnova said.

The Travelers Express Invitational will feature K-State, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Missouri and New Mexico State.

Both Nebraska and Oklahoma finished higher than K-State in last year's Big 12 standings.

However, Lena Piliptchak, who was first team All-Big 12 in doubles last year, believes what happened in the past is no indication of what will happen in this weekend's invitational.

"Last year, OU and Nebraska both beat us, but we think we're much stronger this year," Piliptchak said. "I'm confident in the team."

Although the team is returning some All-Big 12 selections, two new faces will lead the team into the season opener. Freshman Eva Novotna and redshirt freshman Anna Pampoulova will play in the top flight of the tournament for the Cats.

Novatna and Pampoulova clinched the team's top two spots, but Coach Steve Bietau said he has confidence in the other team members.

"We have a number of players that I would feel good about putting in those positions," Bietau said. "Nothing is set in stone."

Only individual standings will be recorded in the invitational.

Bietau said the individual format is best for his team during the fall season.

"I'd say at this point in the year, it's very much an individual thing," he said. "We're trying to take each piece of the team and make it as strong as possible."

Bietau said he hopes that this week's tournament can help build a fan base for future tournaments.

"We typically have small crowds," Bietau said. "We feel like when we start playing team matches here in the spring, if we can get 50 to 100 students at a match," he said, "that's enough to make it noticeably harder for our opponents."

Bietau said attending a tennis match should be fun.

"Tennis doesn't have to be, and I don't think it should be, a deal where you just sit on your hands and do nothing," he said. "It doesn't have to be a stuffy atmosphere."

"College tennis is unique and one of the leaders in the sport as far as having a fun atmosphere," Bietau said.

The tournament will be at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area starting at 8:30 a.m. Saturday and Sunday.

K-State fans simply bandwagoning; basketball attendance perfect example

"Wildcat fans, are you ready?"

"Wildcat fans, ARE YOU READY?"

Sadly enough, on Saturday night, the answer was a collective, "No."

Granted, there have certainly been games that were more fun to watch than the 23-20 squeaker over Ohio, but K-State fans made it painfully obvious that they aren't there for the team in good times and in bad, through sicker and poorer. You know the rest.

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

DAN MERKER is a senior in computer science. You can send your e-mail comments to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu.

That doesn't, however, come as a big surprise. I'm not one of the many around here who have been raised to see no color other than purple. I haven't been brainwashed since birth to think K-State was pious and everything else wasn't worth wasting thought about.

I chose to come to K-State, and I'm happy with my choice. After all, I could have gone to that other school.

Because of this lack of a biased upbringing, I have been able to see the transformation of K-State, for the most part, from the outside. I haven't had the violet-colored glasses to obscure my view of reality.

K-State fans aren't any better than anyone else. We aren't louder, and we definitely aren't more loyal than any other fans.

I remember, however vaguely, the days when K-State was a basketball school. I remember the days of Mitch Richmond, Steve Henson and Lon Kruger. I remember when the Cats rocked Ahearn Field House and occasionally beat the Jayhawks.

I also remember the days when the football program was a laughingstock. There was a stretch between 1986 and 1989 when they didn't win a single game.

I give credit to Coach Bill Snyder and his staff for turning the program around. They deserve all the support in the world and have gotten it. Home attendance reached a KSU Stadium low of 18,949 per game in 1986, but soared to 42,980 per game last season. Not too bad for a stadium with an official capacity of 42,000. K-State fans, are you proud? You should be.

While admittedly going in a different direction, the men's basketball program has basically disappeared, at least in the mind's eye of Wildcat fans.

Attendance reached a high of 12,978 fans per game in 1988-89, the year after losing out to the hated (and eventual champion) Jayhawks for a trip to the Final Four. As the program has slowly fallen to the Big 12's basement (OK, it was a tie), attendance has fallen to a low of 7,210 in 1995-96 before rebounding to 8,248 a year ago. This is despite the fact that the team has made it to the NCAA Tournament three times since 1990. Now are you so proud?

Cats enjoy bye week after lackluster performance

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

Whether the players like it or not, Coach Bill Snyder is glad his football team is off this weekend.

"It's good for our football team," Snyder said. "Most players enjoy playing. They like playing the game, and they want to get on with it.

"We've got a lot of things to get corrected, and we just need a little bit of time to reassess things, so I think it will be helpful," he said.

For instance, there's the passing offense. Quarterback Michael Bishop provided 172 of the 206 yards of the passing offense. But against Ohio, he completed just three of 14 attempts for a 93-yard total and was sacked twice for a total loss of 16 yards.

Jonathan Beasley's probable redshirt year vanished before Wildcat fans' eyes when he went in for the flailing Bishop in the third quarter.

"Jonathan didn't play very well in the ballgame," Snyder said. "We didn't have him mentally ready to play."

Passing the ball requires that the ball be caught, and that only happened four times last Saturday. The wide receiving core issue is becoming more prominent, but Snyder is convinced they are perfectly capable of handling the job.

"I have seen virtually all of them show signs of brightness," Snyder said. "There is a tremendous lack of consistency in their being able to do that on a very regular basis."

The wideout group consists of young players who are inexperienced at the Division I-A level of the game.

"Part of it comes from us not being as demanding as we need to be," Snyder added.

Tight end Jarrett Grosdidier is also convinced the receivers will step up and get things done in future games.

"The receivers are perfectly capable," Grosdidier said. "Last game was not the way they usually play. Those guys are brand new, and with a little time they'll be fine."

The extra week comes at perhaps the best time it could for this team to fix the offensive kinks, Snyder said.

"I don't think we're anywhere near where we need to be with the passing game in terms of how we execute it and understand it," Snyder said.

"A two-week period of time gives an opportunity to clean some of that up."

Wolf Kahn display newest attraction at art museum

PRISCILLA TUCKER, Manhattan area resident, views the works of Wolf Kahn at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art on Thursday afternoon.

IVAN KOZAR
Collegian

RUSSELL FORTMEIER
senior staff writer

Although the artist Wolf Kahn couldn't make it to the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art for his solo exhibition, his dealer filled his shoes, so to speak.

Jerold Melberg, owner of the Melberg Gallery in Charlotte, N.C., is Kahn's friend and dealer — someone close enough to the artist to speak for him, which is what he did at a morning talk given at the art museum.

Melberg read a series of the artist's quotes, some as fresh as a Thursday morning phone conversation between the two friends.

"'Art is a collaboration between an artist and God. The less work the artist has to do, the better,'" Melberg quoted Kahn as saying.

Further Kahn musings suggested the richness of the artist's nearly 50-year career in art: "Let this thought annihilate the arbitrary differences set up between abstract and representational art," "Only the on-going alertness of the artist will keep the conversation of the colors alive," and "Seeing a coloristic event intensely, if just briefly, is all that I need."

Melberg was Kahn's medium, letting the artist's stories come alive, further reinforced by the lecture's pleasant setting in the gallery interior surrounded by Kahn's color-rich works.

The windy Kansas day, full of greens, purples and blues seemed to have swept into the gallery via Kahn's paintings and his insights through Melberg were the audience's concert in the park, exaggeration aside.

Kahn, again through Melberg, summed up his exquisite pastel work: "Pastel is the dust on butterfly's wings."

Melberg finally talked for himself at the end of the lecture.

He discussed his appreciation of the "controlled accident" in art, particularly in Kahn's work. Kahn's paintings do have a random, spontaneous quality to both the brushwork and the color.

"I think that's exactly what Wolf does," Melberg said. "I think (artists) go to a place that is a little out-of-body. They are consumed by what they are doing."

Melberg has been friends with Kahn since 1980. Melberg also represents Dale Chihuly, whose orange chandelier hangs in the main stair of the art museum. Friday night at the art museum, Melberg will give another lecture to the Friends of Art about collecting art.

Kahn wasn't available for a gallery talk because summer and fall are his prime seasons for painting in the outdoors of New England.

The exhibition "Wolf Kahn: A dialogue between tradition and abstract art" will be in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art until Oct. 19. Museum hours are from 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Tuesday through Friday and from 1 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. Saturday and Sunday. The museum stays open until 7:30 p.m. on Thursdays. Admission is free. CD takes place of missed show

SANDY DAVIS
staff writer

He was live in Manhattan last week, and if you're like me, you missed the show. Good thing his compact disc is there to fill that empty spot in your heart.

Ty Herndon is one of country's newest stars, and his album "Living in a Moment" has to be one of this year's country-music must-haves.

Review — Music

The album has the most popular of Herndon's songs heard on the radio, "Living in a Moment," "She Wants to be Wanted Again," "Loved Too Much" and "Before There Was You." These songs are moving to listen to even if you've heard them a million times before.

"Returning the Faith" has a gospel sound with a rock kick to it, a refreshing twist on the standard young country beat heard in many of Herndon's songs. The song sends the message of giving back to the person you love, or as last season's finale of "Wings" put it, "It's your turn."

"I Know How the River Feels" is a beautiful ballad about finding a love so true and wonderful, it's like coming home after a long, difficult journey.

Other songs include "Don't Tell Mama," a song about a young man killed while driving drunk, reminiscent of some of George Strait's narrative songs and "I Have to Surrender," sending the message that to find love sometimes it's necessary to move slowly, wait patiently and surrender control.

Herndon's "Living in a Moment" album examines the emotions and moments in time that are bigger than any one person yet define us as individuals.

It focuses not just on romantic love but on the bigger love that fills all life.

This CD is one every country fan will want to have.

Bands compete in Opus 11 for cash, public recognition

PHIL KELLUM
staff writer

Eight unsigned bands will rock the free-speech zone starting at 5 tonight.

They will be part of the Opus 11 Band Competition sponsored by Union Program Council's Eclectic Entertainment Committee and KQLA-FM 103.5. Each band will get a 20-minute set to showcase its best work, in hopes of placing in the top three of the evening.

Opus 11 performers
- Common Ground
- Cooker
- The Gobofiddlers
- Sundry Genres
- Deege
- Nine X
- Left Turn Headstone
- El Eminopy

First prize is $400, second prize is $250, and third prize is $150.

Doug Lacy, eclectic entertainment chairman, said the prize money comes from the $40 entry fee that every band paid to enter the competition.

"The decision process gets tougher every year. As word spreads, more and more high quality bands enter," Lacy said.

Bands from Nebraska, Missouri, Wichita, Kansas City and Lawrence applied to be a part of Opus 11.

To be eligible for the competition, bands had to submit an application form, along with a tape consisting of two songs. One song had to be original. A $40 entry fee was required as well. The entry fee is non-refundable.

The bands were judged on originality of music, vocal ability and instrumental ability. Lacy said 14 bands submitted tapes and six didn't make the cut.

The eight bands slated to perform tonight are Common Ground, Cooker, The Gobofiddlers, Sundry Genres, Deege, Nine X, Left Turn Headstone and El Eminopy (pronounced L-M-N-O-P).

Five judges will select the winners. The judges are Mike Hodgson, UPC president; Colin Rafferty, representative of Streetside Records; Scott Ladd, Collegian editor in chief; a student judge picked from the crowd via random numbering; and a fifth judge to be announced.

Lacy said Opus has survived this long because it is one of the only real forums that bands have to compete against one another in Manhattan.

"We give local and regional bands a chance," he said.

Lacy expects a turnout similar to last year's attendance of around 1,000 people.

"Good weather will increase the numbers, of course," he said.

Past Opus competitors that went on to score record deals and embark on national tours include Lawrence's Vitreous Humor and Manhattan's own Truck Stop Love.

Opus 11 starts at 5 p.m. in the free-speech zone between the K-State Student Union and Seaton Hall. In case of inclement weather, the competition will be in the Union Ballroom.

Student wins award for sensory analysis work

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff writer

Grace Brannan has dedicated her life to sensory analysis for more than a year. In June, she received an award that made it worthwhile.

"Receiving this award is more like a learning process for me," Brannan said. "It builds up my confidence."

Brannan, a K-State doctoral student, won first place at the Institute of Food Technologists annual meeting this summer in Orlando, Fl. She received the Rose Marie Pangborn Award, which recognizes competent research in sensory evaluation and students' ability to effectively communicate the nature of their work and their findings.

A three-time finalist for the award, Brannan took fourth place in 1994 and second place in 1996 before winning the $350 cash award in June.

"She's the kind of student that everyone would want to see do well," Carole Setser, professor of food science and nutrition, said.

Setser serves as one of Brannan's professors.

Although Brannan's doctoral research involves evaluating the bitterness and astringency of more than 40 varieties of sorghum and relating sensory characteristics of each variety to its phenolic acid content, she had to step back from the focus of the research to solve the immediate problem.

"It was useless to try to study astringency and bitterness in sorghum without an improved rinse," Brannan said. "When you're sampling several bitter or astringent substances, any carry-over effect between one substance and the next one being tested will alter the results."

Purified water, the traditional intermittent rinse, is not effective, she said. She tested six rinses in different combinations and found two combinations, xanthan gum and corn oil solution and carboxymethyl cellulose solution, equally effective at reducing residual bitterness.

The carboxymethyl cellulose solution produces the lowest residual effect for astringency. Therefore, it is most suitable for professional use, Brannan said.

Her doctoral research is part of a larger K-State research program to identify sorghums that might be suitable for multigrain foods and baked goods.

Sorghum is a great source of phenolic acid, a plant-based chemical, with anti-carcinogenic properties research has shown to have the potential of preventing cancer.

Basic scientific research must be completed before sorghum becomes a common ingredient in snacks and baked goods. Because it lacks gluten, a critical element to successful baked goods, sorghum will probably be tried first as an ingredient in multigrain products, Brannan said.

"Ultimately, the search is on for a variety or varieties of sorghum that are not too bitter or astringent but still have the necessary phenolic compounds that would be beneficial to consumers," Brannan said.

She plans to continue her study of sorghum's palatability. She will also carry out the chemical analysis to correlate bitterness, astringency and phenolic acid content of each variety. This information will help with sorghum selection for future product development.

"Grace has many good things going well for her," Setser said. "She's halfway through her prelims, well on her way to her doctorate, and she won the award. No one deserves it more," she said.

Brannan's ultimate goal is to be a competent sensory grain scientist with hopes of contributing more to the field down the line.

After school, she wants to continue research at the university or in the grain science industry.

"It's exciting to discover new things." she said.

Brannan, a native of the Philippines, earned a bachelor's degree from the University of the Philippines at Diliman, Quezon City. She completed her master's degree at the University of Georgia and enrolled at K-State in 1995.

Tournament promotes philanthropic tradition

LANDON TRAWNY
staff writer

Greek houses will get down and dirty this weekend during the Spiketacular Volleyball Tournament philanthropy.

The Beta Theta Pi fraternity and Gamma Phi Beta sorority have worked many years together sponsoring the event.

"It is a well set-up and traditional philanthropy that we have done since the early '80s," said Kristen Hedberg, junior in elementary education and Gamma Phi philanthropy chair.

Fifteen fraternity and five sorority teams have entered in this year's double-elimination tournament. Phi Gamma Delta accounts for four teams entered in Spiketacular.

"We have always had good participation from the greek community," said Andy Ayers, senior in architectural engineering and Beta philanthropy chair.

Ayers and Hedberg said around $2,500 is usually raised during the tournament. The money raised from entry fees and business sponsors will be divided between the Betas and Gamma Phis and given to charities.

The Betas' portion of the money will be given to the Manhattan Youth Center. Laura Beaty, senior in recreation and park administration and Gamma Phi member, said the Gamma Phis will split their half between two charities.

Camp Hope in Topeka, a charity for children with cancer, will receive part of the money. The other part will go to Schelt, a program for underprivileged girls in Prince Edward Island, Canada.

This year's Spiketacular will begin at 4 p.m. Friday at Wildcat Creek and will continue at 9 a.m. Saturday.

Hedberg expects the enthusiasm to be as high as ever in the fraternity bracket.

"Fraternities love sand volleyball," Hedberg said.

She said the teams get more competitive when there are more teams to beat.

Beaty said that she also believes this year's Spiketacular will be successful.

"Expect it to be a good time," Beaty said.

TIAA CREF
Ensuring the future for those who shape it.℠

*Source: Morningstar, Inc., June 1997. Morningstar is an independent service that rates mutual funds and variable annuities. The top 10% of funds in an investment category receive five stars and the next 22.5% receive four stars. Morningstar proprietary ratings reflect historical risk-adjusted performance, and are subject to change every month. They are calculated from the account's three-, five-, and ten-year average annual returns in excess of 90-day Treasury bill returns with appropriate fee adjustments, and a risk factor that reflects performance below 90-day T-bill returns. The overall star ratings referred to above are Morningstar's published ratings, which are weighted averages of its three-, five-, and ten-year ratings for periods ending June 30, 1997. The separate (unpublished) ratings for each of the periods are:

Turner pledges $1 billion to create new U.N. foundation

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Media mogul Ted Turner pledged $1 billion Thursday to create a new foundation to benefit United Nations causes, such as helping refugees, fighting disease and cleaning up land mines.

"It's going to go to the poorest people in the world, the people who need it the most," he said.

Turner said his net worth was $2.2 billion as of Jan. 1, but a surge in his Time Warner stock had pushed it to $3.2 billion in the past nine months. He said he would donate $100 million in stock every year for the next 10 years to the new foundation that will work with various U.N. agencies.

"I'm only giving up nine months earnings. It's not that big a deal," Turner told Larry King during an appearance on CNN. "I'm no more poorer than I was nine months ago, and the world is a lot better off."

Turner said he was about to be named to Forbes magazine's list of the top-25 richest Americans — he was 46th last year — "and I'm going to push myself down the list."

Turner, 56, said he plans to raise even more money for his new foundation.

"If you're rich, you can expect a letter or a call from me," he said.

Alvaro de Soto, the U.N. assistant secretary general for political affairs from Peru, said Turner's gift "symbolizes the best of what we all admire in America. I can only hope that his gesture will inspire many."

Turner noted that Congress has refused to pay more than $1 billion in back dues to the United Nations unless the organization streamlines its bureaucracy, cuts staff and reduces future U.S. assessments.

Later, on "Larry King Live," he said his donation will not go toward administrative costs. "That's why the U.S. has still got to pay up what it owes to the U.N."

Turner parlayed a single UHF station in Atlanta in 1970 into a global colossus that includes a smorgasbord of cable channels, movie studios and professional sports teams. He started his TBS satellite superstation in 1976 and CNN in 1980.

As a yachtsman, Turner was skipper of the boat that won the America's Cup in 1977.

He has also gained notoriety for insulting groups from civil rights activists to Christians, earning him the nicknames Mouth of the South and Captain Outrageous.

In April, Turner once again stirred controversy by chiding fellow billionaires Bill Gates and Warren Buffett for not donating more money to charity.

"What good is wealth sitting in the bank?" Turner said at the annual meeting of the Boys and Girls Clubs of America. "It's a pretty pathetic thing to do with your money."

The program strives to provide an environment that promotes healing and growth of women and their children.

"Our goal is protecting the children by empowering the mom," Barnett said.

"In the past, wife abuse was being ignored, and the focus would be put directly on the child. Now, we are taking care and providing assistance for both of them."

I guess a team just has to win. The women's basketball team made it to the NCAA Tournament last season for the first time since 1987.

Fans showed up to Bramlage Coliseum to support the squad. Average attendance last season was 2,863. That doesn't sound like a lot of people until you put it in perspective. In 1995-96, the single-game high was 2,352. That's improvement, but still nothing to be proud of. Those women deserve our support.

Fans are also coming around for the volleyball team. The team has enjoyed a Snyder-esque turnaround, going from 7-25 in 1993 to 26-9 a season ago. It earned its first trip to the NCAA Tournament, and fans came out like never before.

There were two crowds of more than 4,000 last season, including a school record 4,958 against Nebraska. They deserve our support. They play great volleyball. The matches are exciting, and it's just fun to see how loud Ahearn can get.

It makes me sick to see the numbers for baseball crowds. I've seen bigger crowds at intramural basketball games. This sounds funny, but I'm not kidding. It's disappointing and disgraceful, and it makes our university look bad.

Most people aren't K-State fans. They're K-State football fans, and it makes me sick. In fact, they might not even be K-State football fans, just fair-weather fans. To me, there are no uglier words. All the teams deserve our support, no matter what their records are. Most are even good, just unnoticed.

KSU Stadium was full of fair-weather fans Saturday night. The crowd was excited for the first quarter, and it was a great atmosphere. When the Cats scored their second touchdown, the attitude was that they should have. It wasn't important, and the game was over. We all know now it wasn't.

During the lackluster second half, a friend noticed aloud, "This is the first time I've ever been able to hear the cheerleaders." Granted, the team's performance wasn't very good at all, but when the team needed us, we weren't there. On key third downs late in the game with Ohio driving, the cheerleaders could still be heard, and it was sad. The fans — not just the players — had a pitiful game.

Fans need to be the always-optimistic force that picks up the team when it is down, supports it through good and bad, and perhaps helps it survive on emotion alone. That's not happening in Manhattan, and it almost shames me to say I'm a Wildcat.

The Wildcats need a 12th man without danger of a 5-yard penalty. That's where we come in. We need to suit up and be ready to play, no matter what the sport and situation. We need to be "ready to RUMBLE!"

Bookstore celebrates Banned Books Week with readings, exhibits

BYRON VOGEL
staff reporter

The battle against those who would remove materials from libraries, schools and bookstores is on display at the K-State Union Bookstore.

Banned Books Week began yesterday and runs until Saturday.

Familiar titles such as "Oliver Twist" and "The Outsiders" are among 32 featured items at Banned Books Week, an event taking place just beyond the main counter on the lower floor of the Union Bookstore.

Also included in the exhibit are books by Maya Angelou, Judy Blume, Charles Dickens and Walt Whitman.

Daily readings from banned books will take place from 12:30 to 1:30 p.m. to allow better access to Union patrons during lunchtime. Oral presentations will include readings from the various books that have been banned around the world, quotes from authors and scholars about censorship, and a general history of book bannings.

"Individual librarians can take a book, remove it from the shelf and lock it away," Derek Tingstrom, Union Bookstore clerk, said. "Both 'Tom Sawyer' and 'The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn' have been banned at certain schools and put on restricted reading lists so that students will have to present a parental permission slip in order to read the book, or in the worst case, not have access to the book at all within the confines of a school or library."

Tingstrom, who will give an informal reading this week, said the reasons given for banning books vary greatly and are often surprising.

"When I saw that 'Alice's Adventures in Wonderland' was banned, I thought it might have been because it alluded to references of drugs, but I found out it was actually banned in China because they did not like the fact that humans were put on the same level as animals and were speaking with animals," Tingstrom said.

Other such examples include "Tom Sawyer" that has been banned because of its frequent uses of racial epithets, and "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe," which alluded to supernatural occurrences.

Tingstrom also said many non-fiction books, specifically accounts of American Indians and their encounters with white settlers, become targets because of their "skewed history."

"Especially in America, history is written by the winners, so history written from the so-called losers' point of view is deemed not entirely factual and it is often banned for that reason," Tingstrom said.

Other reasons given for banning books are references to violence, sex, disobedience, self-reliance by children and profanity.

Frances Vitali, graduate intern at the Multi-cultural Resource and Research Center, said no one is immune to censorship.

"Historically, censorship of books hasn't been relegated to any specific genre of literature," Vitali said. "In today's society where we're trying to teach kids to be open and honest and good at making strong decisions, it makes no sense to close an entire line of communication by pulling books off of shelves."

Although the majority of book banning occurs in elementary school libraries or in children's sections of public libraries, Tingstrom said it is important that Banned Books Week be supported at K-State and other universities this week.

"Literature is everyone's heritage, and it's important that it remains accessible to everyone. The way to go about changing things is not to ban or censor, but to reach a ground where issues can be discussed instead of silenced," he said.

New greenhouse to foster growth for horticulture students, elderly

AMY BICKEL
staff reporter

Retired farmers and other elderly residents at Valley Vista Good Samaritan Center will be able to get their hands dirty again by nurturing flowers from seedlings to bloomers.

Valley Vista Good Samaritan Center, 2011 Grandview Drive, Wamego, received a nationwide grant to add a greenhouse onto its facility. The greenhouse will provide programs for residents to experience growth of plants and flowers year round.

Gwendolyn Vinson, activity director of the center, said the center was one of four applicants to receive the grant. The grant was established by the Douglas J. Schwartz Living Foundation.

Schwartz was killed in an auto accident shortly before his 20th birthday in March 1987. His parents chose greenhouse grants as a method of keeping his memory alive.

"We're told our facility is the first of its kind in Kansas," Vinson said.

The grant works through the American Horticultural Therapy Association. An estimated $8,000 will be spent building the greenhouse. The grant covers 60 percent of the cost.

"The elderly are very excited about the greenhouse and horticulture therapy program coming out here," said Vinson, who graduated from K-State in horticulture therapy. "Many of the residents are farmers or used to work outside. The winter really gets them down. Now they can watch their flowers bloom in the winter."

Horticulture therapy students will have the opportunity to help with the program in the future. Richard Mattson, horticulture therapy professor, said this was a unique opportunity to establish a greenhouse at a nursing center and for upcoming students to get hands-on experience.

"This is one place for senior interns to get experience close to Manhattan," he said.

Once the internships are implemented, students can study a variety of options.

"There's nothing like it," Mattson said. "It's close to campus, and we can try different methods of enabling gardening to provide human benefit."

The K-State Construction Science Club erected the building Saturday. A formal dedication of the facility will take place at the center at 3 p.m. Saturday.

"The club does community service projects. They learn construction techniques and help someone out in the meantime," Mattson said.

Valley Vista is always looking for volunteers to help with the program.

"This is a very enriched program," Vinson said. "Those enrolled in horticulture therapy or others who want to volunteer can get some good experience. It takes a little more than one hand to help the residents."

Vinson said for some of the residents, it is hard to be put in a place they've never been to before with someone else taking care of them.

"They lose a lot when they come here. We want to try to give something back, something that can help them feel productive," she said.

She also said the effort wasn't about the facility, but about the residents who would soon utilize it and watch the plants grow.

"It's like taking a baby and putting it in their arms for nurturing. Many of them raised their children, their grandchildren and even their great-grandchildren. They don't have the chance to nurture. Plants can take on the role and give them something to nurture again," she said.

Greenhouse projects will start in October. Vinson said everything should be completely running by the end of the year.

"This is a wonderful opportunity to have a facility here," Vinson said. "They might not make anything grow and just get their hands dirty — just as long as they are enjoying themselves. When I see them smile, it makes my day. They are very special people."

Committee to solicit student input on fees

SARA BURDETTE
staff reporter

The Privilege Fee Committee will conduct a feedback tour this week to educate students as well as obtain student input on how the privilege fees are spent.

"It is the goal of the committee to get information out about fees, but we also want to get input from the students so that it is not only us making the decision where the fees are spent," Kim Peschka, secretary, said.

The tour will include activities ranging from a Committee of Campus meeting to a question-and-answer session with some of the directors of organizations who are up for fee review this year.

The directors' forum will be at noon Tuesday in the K-State Student Union Courtyard. Aaron Otto, committee chair, said in addition to the open question-and-answer session, they hope to discuss improvements that can be made.

The committee will also be in the Derby, Kramer and Van Zile food centers from 4:45 to 6:15 p.m. Thursday. Members of the committee will be stationed at the food centers and will pass out fliers and get input from the students, Peschka said.

"We want to solicit information from a variety of students," Peschka said.

"A lot of students don't know what fees go for."

In addition, the committee will have an open committee meeting at 7 p.m. Sept. 29 in Union 213. Otto said every year the committee passes a budget resolution, and this year they are opening the meeting up to the students.

"Obviously our main goal is to educate students, but we also hope to get their input as well. We want to know if they feel a fee should be cut or increased, or if the service is doing a good job," Brandon Konda, committee member, said.

Otto said the committee has no idea how the turnout will be.

"We have no goals as far as numbers. We just choose to put a vehicle in front of the students, and if they choose to drive, great," Otto said.

The committee will also speak to the Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Council to let them know of the events.

The committee has been discussing the tour since April, and because it is the first year for the tour, Otto said he

Group to sleep under stars to help homeless shelter

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff reporter

K-State's Silver Key Honorary will have its third annual sleep-out Tuesday to raise money and awareness for homelessness.

Members have set personal goals to raise money on their own, and the group will accept donations throughout the night. All donations collected will go to the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

The sleep-out, which is from 1 p.m. Tuesday to 7 a.m. Wednesday, will take place in the free-speech zone in front of the K-State Student Union.

Last year Silver Key raised $900 for the shelter, nearly 7 percent of the shelter's yearly budget, said Junell Norris, director for the shelter.

This year, Silver Key hopes to raise more than last year to help offset federal budget cuts, which have been passed on to the shelter through the state level.

"Unfortunately, the cuts are at a time when the need for our services is increasing," Norris said. "And it's with new people. They've been balancing on the knife's edge for years, and something has happened to make them homeless."

Norris said an average of 10 to 15 people stay at the shelter each night. Although most are single, Norris said she has seen a rise in both single and two-parent families with one to three children.

To kick off the event, the Shoot-Out Challenge, featuring members of K-State's women basketball team, has been added to this year's events to raise money for the shelter.

"Another one of our focuses is the women's basketball team. We wanted something where we could have attention on the women's team and create awareness for them, and at the same time, raise money for the shelter," said Emily Howard, sophomore in accounting and finance and public relations manager for Silver Key.

Basketball goals will be set up at the site from 1 to 4 p.m. Tuesday, and anyone can challenge a member of the team to a game of P-I-G or one-on-one. The cost to challenge is one dollar. Winners will be entered into a prize drawing for a chance

SGA members face impeachment if convicted of crimes during term

campus government editor

It took four hours of debate and nine amendments, but on Thursday, Student Senate passed a constitutional amendment defining grounds for impeachment for most members of the Student Governing Association.

The bill needed a two-thirds majority vote, 42, to pass. It passed 42-7, with one person abstaining.

According to the bill, the Senate chair is required to bring impeachment charges against SGA members who are convicted and sentenced of a felony or classed misdemeanor while they are in office.

The student body president and vice president, any cabinet officer, the Senate chair and vice chair, the Senate intern coordinator, the Student Senate Faculty Senate representative and any Senate committee chair can be impeached by the bill.

The bill also affects student senators, Senate interns, the attorney general and any member of the judicial branch whose appointment is subject to Senate.

After a resolution of impeachment is brought before Senate, it must obtain a majority vote to move the proceedings to Student Tribunal. In Tribunal, a two-thirds majority must be obtained before an individual is removed from office.

Jeff Dougan, Senate chair, said the legislation answered three problems that have arisen in the past. He said the two-thirds majority vote Senate had to get under the old legislation did not work.

"You don't have all the emotions that are just tied down by 15 friends not wanting to see their friend go," he said.

Dougan said that because the Senate chair is mandated to bring charges against individuals, senators won't see it as a personal attack.

"It removes that curiosity that so-and-so is attacking someone, this person doesn't like that person, so they're trying to impeach them. It removes that. It fixes that," Dougan said.

Dougan said the new bill will bring consistency from year to year. He also said the old impeachment process had no integrity.

"It brings integrity back to the process. Our impeachment process has no integrity as it is because it does not work," he said.

Much of the discussion and debate centered around section 1303 of the bill, which originally stated that charges will brought against people who commit a felony or any type of misdemeanor.

Dougan said section 1303 does not ask if a crime is just. He said it asks if a law was broken.

"If someone breaks the law and they are convicted and sentenced, then they broke the law. That is a crime against society," Dougan said.

Senate up close

Student Senate passed legislation that calls for impeachment proceedings to be brought against elected officials convicted and sentenced of classed misdemeanors and felonies while in office.

- Class A misdemeanor — a fine of not more than $2,500 or more than a year in jail.
- Class B misdemeanor — a fine of not more than $1,000 or more than six months in jail.
- Class C misdemeanor — a fine of not more than $500 or more than a month in jail.

2 killed in early morning fire near Abilene Sunday morning

ABILENE, Kan. — A man and young boy were killed early Sunday morning in a fire inside a camper near Abilene, officials said. The names of the victims were not immediately released because relatives had not been notified.

The bodies found at the scene were believed to be those of a 39-year-old man and 3-year-old boy from Manhattan, a Dickinson County dispatcher said.

The fire was in a rural area, about 7 miles northwest of Abilene.

The state fire marshal was investigating the cause of the blaze.

Home Depot to pay millions to settle sex discrimination suit

SAN FRANCISCO — Home Depot has agreed to spend $104.5 million to settle a sex discrimination lawsuit filed by female workers who accused the nation's largest home improvement chain of denying them advancement.

The settlement announced Friday covers as many as 25,000 current and former employees and several thousand job applicants in 10 states, plaintiffs' lawyers said.

Under the agreement, Home Depot would pay those employees and applicants $65 million, $22.5 million in legal fees and $17 million to overhaul employment programs nationwide. It also includes settlement of three sex discrimination suits in Louisiana and New Jersey.

The 1994 lawsuit accused Home Depot of limiting women to menial jobs, denying them the same training opportunities and pay as men and refusing to hire women who expressed an interest in management.

Plaintiff Jacqueline Genero said when coworkers named her the Colma, Calif., store's first female employee of the year, the company didn't pay her the $500 bonus given to men. She also said she made $8 an hour for work that earned men $16 or more.

Home Depot has 536 stores in the United States and 31 in Canada, employs 118,200 people and has reported sales of $19.5 billion in 1996.

Several nationwide chains have settled bias or discrimination lawsuits recently, including Publix Super Markets ($85 million), Lucky supermarkets ($60 million) and Texaco ($176 million).

IBM advances computer chip technology using copper

NEW YORK — IBM has found a way to make computer chips with copper instead of aluminum, a breakthrough designed to speed up computers and make them more affordable.

Copper carries electrical signals faster than aluminum, long the industry standard, but is harder to apply to the silicon surface of each chip.

On Monday, International Business Machines Corp. plans to announce it will start selling copper chips early next year.

Switching metals could speed a microprocessor up to 40 percent while cheapening its manufacturing could raise costs by 30 percent, resulting in computers that think faster and store more information.

The technology will enable chips to operate on less electricity, making them useful for laptop computers and other battery-operated electronics.

IBM said its new manufacturing process enables it to make transistors more than 500 times thinner than human hair, or about 30 percent smaller than the circuitry in the most sophisticated chips now available.

PRINCIPLES OF SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

Average annual compound rates of total return (periods ending 6/30/97)*

YOU'RE LOOKING AT TWO COMPLETELY OPPOSITE, FUNDAMENTALLY DIFFERENT WAYS TO INVEST IN STOCKS. WE RECOMMEND BOTH.

Whether you want a fund that selects specific stocks, or one that covers the market, we're on the same page. Our CREF Growth and CREF Equity Index Accounts use two distinct strategies for investing in the stock market, but both aim to provide what every smart investor looks for: long-term growth that outpaces inflation.

The CREF Growth Account searches for individual companies that we believe are poised for superior growth. In contrast, the Equity Index Account looks for more diversification, with a portfolio that seeks to mirror the experience of the U.S. stock market as a whole.

Spiketacular fund-raiser helps send children to camp

ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI
staff reporter

"Up, up, up. Keep it up!" players shouted to their teammates during the final match at the Gamma Phi Beta and Beta Theta Pi Spiketacular Volleyball Tournament philanthropy Saturday.

GREEK LIFE

The final game in the men's division, between the Lambda Chi Alpha and Theta Xi fraternities, ended 7-15 with Theta Xi winning the tournament for the third year in a row.

"We started off real slow but pulled it together in the end," said Ian Spurgeon, senior in history and member of Theta Xi.

In a close final game, the Chi Omega sorority won the women's division against Alpha Chi Omega. The score was 17-15.

"They were really equally matched. The Alpha Chis played really well," said Megan Miller, senior in public relations.

The tournament lasted through Friday afternoon and all day Saturday at Wildcat Creek Sports Center.

Even though Saturday morning started out cold and rainy, Laura Beaty, Gamma Phi assistant philanthropy chair, said she felt the tournament had gone well.

"The support for the teams has been great. They've all been really gung-ho, and we've had lots of support for houses from their teams," Beaty said.

Sixteen fraternity teams and five sorority teams participated in the tournament. Phi Gamma Delta accounted for four teams, and Lambda Chi had two teams.

"We had a lot of guys who wanted to play, and having two teams gave everyone an opportunity. That way, we can develop some younger talent for next year," said Clay Seese, Lambda Chi president.

According to Kristen Hedberg, Gamma Phi philanthropy chairwoman, around $2,000 was raised by the tournament.

The money will be divided between the two sponsors. The Betas will give their half to the Manhattan Youth Center, and the Gamma Phis will divide their money between two camps for children.

Half will go to Camp Hope in Topeka, a camp for children with cancer. The other half will be given to Camp Seschelt, a program for underprivileged children in Canada.

Though the reason for gathering was philanthropic, the goal was to have fun and play hard.

"It's fun to see everybody come out and support a good cause and also have people really get into the game and the competition too," Seese said.

Seminar prepares high school students for college success

KERRY BOYDSTON

Secrets to becoming a successful K-State student were shared with 600 potential students and their parents Saturday at the College Success Seminar in the K-State Student Union.

"This was our chance to bring in families and students and show them the resources we offer here and exactly how they can make college a success," Mitzi Frieling, admissions representative, said.

High school juniors and seniors from Kansas communities were invited to take part in the event.

Students were presented information on topics such as obtaining financial aid, studying abroad, campus culture, time management and living arrangements in Manhattan. They were also given the opportunity to tour the campus, residence halls and greek houses throughout the day.

Sasha Lovell, senior at Topeka High School, said she would like to come to K-State and try out for the K-State Marching Band.

"I play a lot of instruments and wouldn't mind joining the band. I also think it would be fun to join a sorority and study genetics here. But if I want to come here, I have to get some scholarships first," she said.

Dustin Petz, senior in agribusiness, and Matt Christensen, senior in education, volunteered their time by consulting high school students about possible majors.

Petz said he enjoyed spending the day meeting the potential students.

"I just want them to know K-State is a friendly place, and we are here to help them if they have any questions or problems with selecting a college," he said.

All residence hall students can surf Internet from privacy of their rooms

K-State's residence halls are getting wired.

The Department of Housing and Dining Services is offering in-room ethernet connections to all nine residence halls. The service is called ResNet Ethernet Connection.

"We're hoping to further increase the quality of residence hall life by focusing on the improvement of academic areas," said Mary Molt, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services.

According to Yahoo Internet Life magazine, K-State is one of the nation's 100 Most Wired Colleges.

K-State is also the only Kansas regents school recognized for hardware, wiring and academic use of the Internet top 100.

Computing and Network Services allows the use of necessary software to access the campus network and the Internet free of charge for enrolled students. This includes an Internet browser, e-mail client, newsgroup reader, ftp and telnet.

For students with the hardware, Housing and Dining Services will provide the software to get them on the Internet.

An ethernet connection costs students a one-time fee of $150. If students decide to move out and then return to the halls, they will not be charged a second time.

There is no monthly service charge. Additional advantages include a phone line that won't be tied up, and it does not require an extra online service or a modem.

"We've had ethernet for about four years, and the number of connections grow every year," said Danya Hatley, residence computing coordinator for Housing and Dining Services.

About 700 residence hall students are connected. For many students, it's the reason they stay in the halls, she said.

"It's certainly nice not having to wait in line for a computer in the computer labs during the day, and you can also print to the laser printer through the ethernet network," Jarrod Mann, senior in architectural engineering, said.

Hatley said not only are students interested, but their parents are thrilled as well.

"Parents like it because they know that students aren't at a computer lab late at night," she said. "They know that students are safe in their rooms, and it also cuts down long-distance charges."

Interested students need an ethernet network card with a 10baseT connection installed in their personal computer and a 25-foot long ethernet cable, which is available for purchase from the Quik Cats student store in Van Zile Hall.

Housing and Dining Services recommend the KTI N2000/PNP as an NE2000 ISA card for Intel ISA machines and a 3Com brad (3C905) PCI card for Pentium users. Some ethernet-ready Power Macintoshes will need a 10baseT transceiver.

Students with questions and comments can call Housing and Dining Services at 532-6453 or e-mail at housing@ksu.edu.

Glass ceiling maintains salary inequality

JACOB JANSONUS
staff reporter

One of the biggest problems women face today in the work force is the difference between men's and women's salaries.

Torry Dickinson, assistant professor of women's studies, said because of the wage gap between salaries, a change is imperative.

"The workplace for women and minority men is really changing," Dickinson said. "Global competition is increasing, and women won't be able to keep one job all their lives. With so much disruption and the work force demanding an upgrade in skill workers, many people will be forced to change jobs."

On Friday, Dickinson presented a film called "A Critical Examination of the National Working Women's Summit." Dickinson said she hoped the film would help the Friday Focus Group become more aware of women's economic status in society today.

Bonnie Linxwiler, senior in geography, said she wasn't as aware of the problem until she took a women's studies class.

"Women's studies really opened my eyes to the struggles women are facing," Linxwiler said. "We need to communicate with the government and really push the issue of gender equality. This is society's problem, not just women's."

The film pointed out shortcomings by the national government to remove "glass ceilings" from the labor force.

"Glass ceilings" are the invisible barriers that prevent women and minority men from moving up the economic ladder. Barriers that were addressed were stopping discrimination, monitoring legislation and creating pension plans for women.

"Right now women only make about 80 cents to the man's dollar. They do the same work, but the pay is unequal," Dickinson said. "Men and women are not aware of what is happening. People need to start getting involved."

Dickinson said the first step can be taken by K-State administration and officials.

"K-State needs to organize administrators, professors and departments to work in groups and talk to students and local governments," Dickinson said. "The more they understand, the more we can do."

Senators should be commended for passing impeachment bill

Student senators should be commended for their efforts Thursday night. They should be commended for passing an impeachment bill that is a step in the right direction.

Although the impeachment bill was debated for four hours and numerous amendments were introduced, the final product is worth all the hard work.

It is fair and the right thing to do.

The past has shown that the impeachment process needed to be changed, and the bill passed will help those changes come about. No longer will senators be allowed to commit classed misdemeanors without impeachment charges being brought against them.

By mandating the Senate chair to bring forth an impeachment resolution, no feelings will be hurt.

Had misdemeanors and felonies been excluded from this legislation, a great injustice would have occurred.

Nothing would have changed. No charges of impeachment would have been brought against anyone. Crimes against society would have had no bearing on an individual's eligibility to serve the student body.

Senators and other members of the Student Governing Association should not be getting into trouble with the law. If individuals are convicted and sentenced of a crime while in office, they should no longer be able to represent the student body, depending on the severity of the crime.

No one is asking for the removal of an elected official who has been convicted of littering, but certain crimes should not go unnoticed and unpunished.

A special thanks should go out to Student Body President Tim Riemann. Without his passionate debate, the chances are slim that this bill would have passed in the form that it was. He challenged senators to live up to the standard of the law, and they accepted his challenge.

Thanks should also go out to all the senators who voted for this bill. It showed a lot of dedication to debate the issue until 2 a.m. It took courage to vote a bill that polices outside life.

To everyone this bill affects, challenge yourself to live by it. It shouldn't be difficult. All you have to do is follow the law.

Mary Renee's guide to résumés

Résumés don't reflect real life experiences

At this point in my college career, I should have a resume. The Career Fair thingy was last week, and everyone on campus listed their accomplishments, goals for the future and hopes for employment on one well-designed piece of paper so they could pitch themselves to corporate America. I couldn't bring myself to do it.

I have complained about this entire resume/interview/internship scheme in the past and swore I would never bow to its evil power. But now I am bucking up to the fact that I will most likely have to jump the hoops of the pre-employment circus, and a big part of that is writing a resume.

I have no problem filling a page a week with my view on the world or complaints about the campus. I have often used this column to tell stories about my life experiences. You would think I could list my work history and dream job on one measly piece of cotton bond paper. I haven't been able to do it yet.

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH
MARY RENEE SMITH is a sophomore in speech. You can send e-mail to Mary at mojo@ksu.edu.

My resume failure is not due to lack of effort.

I bought a few books on resume writing, thinking it would help to get the corporate juices flowing. I peeked at other people's resumes online, hoping to find an idea I could borrow. No luck. I think the core of the problem is I find the whole resume thing a little silly.

No one lists the really important parts of their life. One of the books I purchased said to list all the significant accomplishments in your life. I have news for them. If, at 25 years of age, the most influential things I have done or learned fit on one page, I am a waste of space. All the meaningful stuff we do every day in our lives wouldn't be appropriate for a traditional resume.

Let's look at what my real resume would look like.

Sophomore in speech but soon to be a junior if I pass this semester's classes.

Expected graduation date: Your guess is as good as mine. Whatever comes first: hell freezes over, financial aid runs out or I get a great job offer.

Objective: To get a great job offer. Must be a well-paying position with limited responsibility. A laid-back, casual workplace with a boss who sets realistic goals and relishes giving large bonuses. The position must allow me time off to spend with my children and the occasional day to sun myself on a rock. Health insurance and stock options are a must. Company car a bonus.

Experience: I have done everything. I ran a summer camp and was an optical technician. I have a knack for public relations, radio news, print journalism and the ability to express my opinion for money. I have also been a waitress, kindergarten teacher aide and vice president of a campus queer organization. (You try getting 35 gay people to agree on anything.) I am in the process of raising two young boys and keeping track of one full-grown man. I have survived life in a dysfunctional family, driving on the Autobahn while putting on lipstick and three years in a college newsroom.

Education: My grandfather taught me to be proud of who you are no matter what you do. My son taught me the people in the car next to me on the highway can't hear me when I yell at them. My mom taught me how to sort laundry. My ex-boyfriend taught me restraining orders are sometimes necessary. My daddy taught me you can't make up for lost time, but you can make the best of the time you have. My friend, Jim, taught me you are never too old to tell a dirty joke or learn a new one.

References: There is a long list of people who would gladly tell you wonderful lies about me so I will get a job and move away.

I don't imagine this resume would get me a real job. It sums up my experience, most of what I am and what I want out of life. I list all the things I have learned that help me every day. That is what a resume is really supposed to do.

READERSwrite

Column left reader pondering statements of truth

Editor,

Majed Khan's column, "Paving the Way," left me pondering events in this world given the light and wisdom of Islam provided by his article.

Khan wrote, "Islam has established for women that which suits their nature, gives them full security and protects them against disgraceful circumstances and uncertain channels of life." In many of the locations where Islam is practiced, women have to wear veils over their entire bodies leaving only their eyes visible. They cannot pick their husband, in many places, they are one of a household of many wives without even a say in that.

In many of these countries and many of the other locations Islam is practiced, women are not allowed to obtain employment, obtain an education above elementary level, or even travel, without a man's permission or without being escorted by another "trustworthy" man. Women cannot even vote or hold political office in those places. Is this what is meant by Islam's granting "... women equal rights to contract, to enterprise, to earn and possess independently"?

In many of the locations where Islam is practiced, women must walk not beside the man, but behind the man. They must eat after the man, enter buildings after the man, everything is after the man. Khan writes that "Islam does not make men the dominant lord of women who have no choice but to surrender to men."

You say that for 1,400 years, Islam has given womankind equality. I say Islam has given women that much time of slavery. It is clear that to Islamic followers, women are nothing but a thing to be possessed or owned. To say that Islamic women have no say over their lives or bodies is an understatement.

Yes, Christianity has made its share of mistakes, but those mistakes are being corrected even as we speak. It might be slow, but it is steady. We've come a long way since the days of Amanda Arnold. Although those of Islamic belief would have you believe they are pure as the windblown snow, they are in some ways worse than we Christians. Indeed, where we Christians are putting actions into words and treating women as equals, those who practice Islam are enslaving them while claiming to be only protecting them.

Union should be reserved as a place to study

Editor,

It is 9 a.m., and I am sitting at the end of the second floor of the K-State Student Union by the elevators. I purposely got to the Union around 7 a.m. to study for a test. As you can see, I am not studying. I'm sure you are asking ... why?

Let me tell you. In the middle of the floor is a group of five to six young men telling one another — and by the loudness of their voices, the entire floor — their previous night's endeavors. So far, I have learned that one of the young men slept on someone's lawn. He has no idea how he got there, a fact that he seems rather proud of. I have also learned two of the young men have narrowed their choice of who their pledge dads will be.

Fine, I understand the need for communication. I am a speech and English major. I know that people cannot not communicate (axiom one). But is that need for communication so demanding they need to share it with the entire floor?

I don't want to seem like these gentlemen are the only culprits. This is by no means the case. I have had the pleasure of having tests that I need to study for when there have been meetings. The only educated guess that I can render is that it has been several years since the meeting attendees have been in school that they cannot read the nonverbal cues of people studying. Books and notebooks open and highlighter in hand is a sure sign.

Also, the big cup of coffee or Mountain Dew should be another clue. If that doesn't tip them off, then maybe the not-so-subtle glances and eye contact that say "please shut up" should do it.

What are we supposed to do if all this fails? Stay there and suffer or go sit in the hallway outside your class until test time?

The Union needs a quiet place to study. Isn't the university's first objective academics?

Rosemary Moore
senior in speech and English

JON KURCHE

It is perhaps the most prominent barrier between humans and bacteria.

Not as in antiseptic, but rather why we are who we are, and why bacteria are who they are. Not that it's bad to be a bacterium, mind you, they have rights, too — it's just that humans are a little different, that's all. That's the whole point of the past three sentences.

You see, unlike the example just set, humans are special because they are such capable communicators. Bacteria, for all appearances, don't do much communicating at all. They just sit there and infect things and try to fight against penicillin and make mucus, which is a fine thing for a bacterium, but it doesn't do much good for a human.

The result is that we are destined to interact, a process that has many benefits — teaching, for instance. We learn and grow from the experiences of others.

I have a calculus teacher named Dave. I don't know what Dave's last name is. He never communicated that to me. He did, however, suggest to my lecture class that if we couldn't hear him we could yell, "Yo, pinhead, speak louder!"

Pinhead.

I love college.

I'm serious, folks. The man is a scientist of perpetual motion — the sort of person who could overwind one of those kinetic watches. He's also an apt communicator. In an attempt to explain derivatives, Dave brought out a metal carry-all and had volunteers sit on it.

He then instructed one student to keep time by looking at a clock and standing in front of the chalkboard moving his arms to the rhythm of the second hand, much like a large version of those Mickey Mouse watches (an honors marketing student cornered the young man after class and tried to buy his image for merchandising).

Adding to his experiment, Dave instructed another student to push the volunteers on the cart across the room and into a wall. At the same time, the cart people were to draw a line along the chalkboard toward the ground. The combined result of forward motion and downward motion on the chalkboard was ... a line. But it was representative of something. Distance over time. Velocity.

I learned quite a bit that day in class. I learned not to send a cart full of students straight into a wall.

I also learned all about derivatives, through a method that held my attention the whole hour. Dave is just that kind of cool.

Teaching can't be an easy thing. I have enough difficulty trying to convey my thoughts to my peers, let alone to an entire class of 500 adolescent, hormone-driven post-pubescents. It would be like trying to express the concept of the color red to a person who only sees black and white.

Wait a minute, all my peers are adolescent, hormone-driven post-pubescents.

What I find is that people can only think in terms of what they have experienced. I'm no exception. Everything I say or do is drawn from my history. No two people can ever hold the same perception of anything because they all will have different experiences from which to draw.

A pair of children could come from the same family, town, home, activities and school — and wind up totally different. There are far more variables to experience. Perhaps they watch different TV programs, perhaps they were in different classes within their school, perhaps they curry favor with one parent over the other, perhaps they partook in different activities — the list is endless. Not to mention they had their own intellectual and physical differences to begin with.

The result is those two children could witness the exact same event and come away with different interpretations of what had just happened. Heavy, eh?

So, how can there be any hope for the rest of us? How do we communicate without common ground?

Well, maybe it isn't all as hopeless as I made it seem. Dave does all right, so perhaps there's still a chance for the rest of us. Words, after all, do carry weight. When successful, they have the power to save lives, build cities and place people on the moon (indirectly, of course). When they fail, they have the power to start wars, burn cities and pollute planets.

They also have the ability to make for really awkward situations. Consider what happened to Aaron Otto, Privilege Fee Committee chairman, along with several other Student Governing Association and administrative members earlier last week. Imagine somebody sending dirty e-mail about you all over campus. Imagine being one of the people who gets to read the aforementioned e-mail.

FACULTY MEMBER: "Make certain to check your e-mail before you leave class. There's something interesting I left you which pertains to your lab."

STUDENT: "Hmm... I have a couple of new messages... this looks promising." <click> "Zowie! Explicit e-mail! I've finally got explicit e-mail! Hooray!"

FACULTY MEMBER: "What's that? Young man, you'd better not be violating K-State's Acceptable Use Policy!"

I guess the pen really is mightier than the sword.

Senate committee to request money to install traffic signals near campus

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff reporter

The Governmental Relations Committee is one step closer to making some wishes come true.

Sunday night the committee met and discussed a wish list of improvements compiled by students that will be presented before the Student Senate on Tuesday. The City/University Project fund has around $250,000 to spend on projects benefiting both the city and university.

The wish list hopes to cover student concerns such as installing a traffic signal at north Manhattan Avenue and Thurston Street, better lighting on Jardine Drive, a traffic signal at Jardine Drive and Denison Street and campus beautification.

Committee members expressed concern about the intersection of north Manhattan Avenue and Thurston Street. They said it was their No. 1 priority because of recent accidents that have occurred at the intersection. They said it was hazardous to pedestrians and bicyclists.

Eric Magette, committee member and senior in kinesiology, said there is a good chance these projects will pass at the Student Senate meeting.

"It's real likely these ideas will go through. Most all things we proposed last year went through," Magette said. "It shows that they listen to our ideas, and we have a pretty good say in issues."

The Government Relations Committee then went on to discuss the idea of recognizing K-State alumni at the capital.

The group being recognized would be called the "Cats in the Capital," and the purpose of the event would be to remind K-State graduates of their roots and be proud of their alma matter, said Mandy Reese, committee vice chair and junior in music education.

Reese said it would help bring more pride to K-State.

"We would recognize anyone in the Capitol building from legislators to secretaries," Reese said. "We hope to remind these K-State graduates that it all began here. We want them to remember that K-State had a very positive influence on their lives."

A new traffic roundabout to be built on north Manhattan Avenue and Claflin Road was also discussed by the committee. The Kansas Department of Transportation is offering to pay 90 percent of the estimated $250,000 cost. The issue at hand is whether students and other living facilities around that area want the roundabout.

Letters have been sent to get the opinions of these nearby living facilities. When the opinions are in, a decision will be made on the roundabout's construction.

Patrick Carney, committee chair, said right now it looks doubtful the roundabout will be built because of safety concerns. Committee members said the hill north of the intersection is dangerous and slippery during the winter. Members also said the roundabout could reduce pedestrian visibility.

"I haven't heard anything really positive about it yet. There are a lot of things to take into consideration as far as safety," Carney said. "We'll just have to wait until the opinion letters come in."

Silver Key, a leadership honorary, has 33 members and is recruiting new pledges for next year. The honorary is for sophomores who have displayed leadership through activities both on and off campus.

Prospective members must meet a certain grade point average the fall semester of their freshman year. Nearly 1,000 applications are sent out each spring semester with an average of 400 to 500 returned.

From returned applications, 80 are selected for interviews and 35 are chosen for membership.

"Silver Key is being in an organization that deals in community service. It shows that even college students are willing to help out and put in the extra time and effort to do good for the community," Howard said.

K-State doubles team takes tournament championship

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

After Eva Novotna's rough first day in the top flight of the Travelers Express Invitational, she bounced back Sunday to claim the doubles championship with her partner, Yana Dorodnova.

They defeated the Nebraska team of Sandra Noetzel and Lisa Hart, 8-3, for the tournament championship.

Dorodnova, senior from Moscow, Russia, said she and Novotna built their confidence as they went through the tournament.

"We played really well," Dorodnova said. "Now we have confidence for the next tournament."

Novotna and Dorodnova sailed through the first round of the tournament with an 8-0 win over Audra Clemons and Andrea Friedman of Missouri.

In the second round, the pair defeated Kate Dunlevy and Danielle Knipp of Oklahoma, 8-2, to advance to the finals.

In contrast to her doubles' performance, Novotna, a freshman from Paradubice, Czech Republic, had a difficult time in her first collegiate singles tournament. The Invitational was her first ever on hard courts.

K-State coach Steve Bietau did not credit Novotna's singles performance to her lack of experience on hard courts.

"I don't think the surface was an issue. I think the level of competition was more of an issue," Bietau said. "It was just having one hard match after another hard match."

On Saturday, Novotna lost to another freshman, Viviana Mracnova of Oklahoma, 6-2, 4-6, 6-0, in the first round.

Novotna faced Simone Bermicker of New Mexico State in a close consolation bracket match.

Novotna won the first set 6-4. Then, after leading 5-3 in the second set, she gave up four games straight to lose the set 7-5. Bermicker won the next set 7-6 and the tiebreaker 7-3.

"It was tough, and I was upset," Novotna said. "But it gave me experience."

She defeated Dunlevy of Oklahoma 6-2, 6-2 in her final match of the day.

K-State's other player in the top flight of the tournament, Anna Pampoulova, redshirt freshman from Sofia, Bulgaria, was defeated 6-4, 3-6, 6-3, in the first round of the tournament by Lisa Hart of Nebraska.

She then advanced into the championship of the consolation bracket with a 6-3, 7-5, win over Dunlevy of Oklahoma.

Pampoulova won the consolation bracket with a 6-3, 6-4, victory over New Mexico State's Bermicker.

There was much controversy in Lena Piliptchak and Pampoulova's third-place win in doubles against Dunlevy and Knipp of Oklahoma.

Piliptchak and Pampoulova were leading the match 7-5 and the game 30-15 when Piliptchak returned a shot near the outside line.

The confusion began when Knipp called Piliptchak's shot wide, but neither Piliptchak nor Pampoulova heard the call. A conference at the net with all four players and the umpire ensued. The umpire couldn't determine whether the ball landed in or out of play, so they played the point again.

As Dunlevy was returning to the service area, she slammed a ball into the fence behind her side of the court. The umpire penalized Oklahoma for the outburst, making the score

CHIEFSupdate

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Elvis Grbac and Kerry Collins put an end to Kansas City's need for late-game heroics.

Grbac picked apart the NFL's second-ranked defense by throwing for 214 yards and three touchdowns Sunday to lead the Chiefs to a 35-14 victory over the Carolina Panthers, who gave up the most points in franchise history.

Collins, in his second game back after being sidelined by a broken jaw during the exhibition season, was intercepted four times and lost one fumble, setting up three Kansas City touchdowns.

The Chiefs (3-1) won their third straight game but the first in which they didn't need some big plays in the last minute. Two weeks ago, Kansas City defeated Oakland 28-27 on a touchdown pass with three seconds left, and last week the Chiefs turned away four passes into the end zone in the final seconds of a 22-16 victory over Buffalo.

This time, Kansas City built a 28-point lead early in the fourth quarter and sent the Panthers (2-2) to their second loss in as many games this season at Ericsson Stadium, where they went 9-0 last year.

HUSKERsave

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Just seven days after the worst Saturday in the Big 12's brief history, Nebraska rode west by northwest to give the new megaconference its greatest win — and just in the nick of time.

Until the Huskers upset No. 10 Washington 27-14 Saturday in Seattle, the Big 12 had a two-year record against ranked non-conference teams of 1-8. The week before, Colorado and Texas had bowed to UCLA and Michigan by an embarrassing combined score of 93-9.

But now the Big 12 can stop frowning and smile. Much-maligned quarterback Scott Frost scored two first-quarter touchdowns and led the No. 3 Huskers past then-No. 2 Washington in the most prestigious win since the Big 12 was formed.

It was only the sixth loss in Washington's last 46 games at home.

"Our offense put it to 'em and stuffed it down their throats all day," said Nebraska defensive end Grant Wistrom. "Every day during the summer when I was lifting weights and every day during two-a-days, this is the game I thought about."

Elsewhere in the Big 12's North Division, it was not such a banner day. Cincinnati stuffed Kansas' 3-0 start down its throat, taking advantage of a raft of turnovers to beat the Jayhawks 34-7. Missouri shook off the pain of last week's loss to Kansas with a 42-21 victory over Tulsa. And winless Iowa State appears headed for what could be a winless season. This time the Cyclones took it on the chin from No. 11 Iowa, 63-20.

In the South Division, just when Texas A&M avenged its worst defeat in decades, Texas Tech suffered a tremendous upset. The Big 12 South just can't catch many breaks this season.

The Aggies made Southwestern Louisiana pay for last year's shocking 29-22 victory by pounding the Ragin' Cajuns 66-0 on Saturday.

"We wanted to come out and smash them around from the first play, and we did," admitted A&M offensive lineman Steve McKinney.

The Red Raiders couldn't muster the same motivation for North Texas, even though Tech was a 32-point favorite and could've been 2-1 for the first time since 1989. North Texas won 30-27 to claim its biggest victory since moving up from Division I-AA in 1995.

"We beat a Big 12 team at their place," UNT running back Hut Allred said. "We went out there and kicked their tails. That's the biggest thrill. I'll take that from this game for the rest of my life."

Also Saturday, Baylor was pasted 38-3 by Michigan and Oklahoma failed to capitalize on the momentum of its first victory, bowing 40-36 to California.

Texas, still trying to recover from a 66-3 annihilation by UCLA, and Oklahoma State were idle.

The 1-3 weekend drops the Big 12 South to 8-7 in nonconference play.

None of the eight victories have come against teams with winning records. Three of them have been against USL and two against Fresno State. The other three losers are a combined 3-10.

Lacrosse team loses to Denver

JEFF PALMER
staff writer

The Big Scary Lions from Colorado were a little too much for the K-State Lacrosse team to handle this weekend at the Donnie Tillar Lacrosse Classic.

The Lions, a pro team based out of Denver, beat the Wildcats 11-6 to earn the championship.

"This is the first time we have lost our own tournament, so it's tough, but it's a learning experience, and our team will move onward and upward from here," Jay Sweet, president and coach of the team, said.

K-State's team, made up of students and Fort Riley soldiers and officers, has only been practicing together for a month, four days a week. Sweet said it was hard to compete against a team that has been together for years and practices more often.

The Classic, which also included teams from Rockhurst College, Tulsa and Nebraska, is in honor of Donnie Tillar, K-State's first lacrosse coach.

"Donnie got this program started. He coached and explained everything to us in the beginning. He was a helicopter pilot and got shot down over Saudi Arabia, and we have this tournament to honor him and help remember what he did for us," Sweet said.

Sweet said this tournament is a chance for the players to play against different competition because the league season isn't until the spring.

Bands compete for exposure

MARY RENEE SMITH
staff writer

The Opus 11 Band Competition sponsored by Union Program Council's Eclectic Entertainment Committee was moved into the Union Ballroom Friday night due to the threat of inclement weather. The event was originally planned for the free-speech zone.

The rain storm never showed up, but about 250 fans of live music did. Manhattan band The Gobofiddlers won the first prize of $400, second prize of $250 went to Nine X and the $150 third prize went to Kansas City band, Deege.

Doug Lacy, Eclectic Entertainment Committee chairman, said the event was a success.

"We had to move it inside for safety's sake," Lacy said, "People who really want to see live music will come out and see Opus," Lacy said.

Eight bands each performed 20 minutes. Five judges awarded points to each band in five categories. The band with the most points won.

Lacy said "The judging was difficult. There were lots of quality musicians," Lacy said.

The Gobofiddlers' singer Aaron Weisbender, freshman in education, said the money won from the competition will help the band pay for the production of their upcoming compact disc. The band has been together for about a year and a half, said Weisbender.

He says the band's sound is influenced by blues music and ska. "I've been listening to blues since I was tiny," said Weisbender.

The band is made up of six people and includes a trombone, trumpet and hamonica. They perform wearing business suits and fedoras.

Weisbender said the competition is a good way for The Gobofiddlers to get out and be heard. "We are young and don't get to play many bars. This gives us exposure," said Weisbender. The band's drummer is 16 years old.

Lacy said local exposure is a big benefit of Opus. "Through this competition we give each of these regional acts needed exposure."

The competition featured a variety of musical styles, including Christian rock and hard rock.

One of the more outrageous bands of the evening was Cooker, whose three-piece ensemble featured a man in drag and the guitarist in a skunk costume.

Ska band transforms old tunes into fast, mean, jazzy sounds

PHIL KELLUM
staff writer

MU330/Blue Meanies split 7-inch (Asian Man Records)

The Go-Go's and Queen on the same single?

Well, kind of.

Two of the leaders of the ska-punk/ska-core scene, MU330 and the Blue Meanies, team up on a split 7-inch single to celebrate their recent tour.

MU330 takes the A side and bashes through its cover of the classic "Vacation" originally done by the Go-Go's.

It was recorded during the sessions for their last album, "Chumps On Parade," so it features their old singer Jason Nelson.

MU330 remains somewhat true to the original song, but gives it a bit more bite in the guitar sound, and their superb horns carry the melody.

I especially loved the gang choruses of "Hey hey hey!"

On the B side, Chicago's Blue Meanies take Queen's "Stone Cold Crazy" and almost creates an all new tune out of it.

Freddie Mercury would be cringing if he heard this one, but it's a wonderful version.

It's fast and mean, leaving Metallica's cover of it in the dust.

Vocalist Billy Spunke's vocals are incredible, with him using a megaphone on some parts to distort the vocals.

The horn section turns in some really discordant and almost free jazz-sounding riffs to cap off a killer cover.

Good, good stuff from two bands that just keep getting better.

The B-3's—"Only Human" b/w "Never Go Away" (Jump Start Records)

Pittsburgh, Pa., has produced some of my favorite bands in recent history, from punkers Aus-Rotten and Anti-Flag to these ska kings, The B-3's.

This record screams "We're from Pittsburgh!" all the way from the Iron City Beer bottles on the cover to the "Pittsburgh Ska" logo on the label of the record.

The B-3's features members of long-gone seminal Pittsburgh bands the Skablins and the Bad Genes.

"Only Human" is a slower, traditional ska tune featuring some great jazzy, bluesy lead guitar bits by Justin "Juddy" Hopper.

His vocals are incredibly soulful on this one too.

The mix is perfect. No one instrument is too loud.

The horn section turns in some well-executed and well-done solos within their own melodies.

The B side, "Never Go Away," is a little more upbeat than the A side, so it might get you moving a bit more on the dance floor.

The horns are more prominent on this track, with more riffs coming from their direction.

The rhythm section of Greg Brancati on bass and Joelle Levitt on drums really shines on this song, with their simple yet driving rhythm.

This record is amazing, especially for a relatively new band on the scene. The B-3's have plans to release a full-length compact disc by 1998, also on Jump Start. Definitely give these guys a listen if you are into ska in any shape or form.

Pittsburgh has done it again.

Small town pulls together for benefit concert

JOHN FRANSON
staff writer

Residents of small towns say living in them is great, except for one thing — everyone knows each other, and everyone knows everyone else's business.

That turned out to be a good thing for one resident of nearby Alma, Kan., when the quaint little town came alive Saturday for a benefit concert in his name.

Sixteen-year-old Wabaunsee High School student Josh Frank was diagnosed two years ago with desmoid tumors, a rare condition.

Josh's disease is even rarer because of the pattern of tumor growth. The tumors were not supposed to spread past his legs. But the tumors defied the odds, attaching to a nerve and spreading to his pelvis, Jenny Frank, Josh's mother, said.

Doctors tried many therapies: radiation implants, outside radiation, chemotherapy, hormone treatments. Nothing seemed to work.

Every time doctors have done an MRI, the tumor mass has doubled in size, Jenny Frank said.

The worst news came in July, when Josh's leg had to be amputated.

Soon after, Alma resident Don Hafenstein and his son, Russell, came up with the idea of a fund-raiser for Josh and his parents, who faced skyrocketing medical expenses.

Russell planned to perform with his band, Laughing Out Loud, in honor of Josh, but after the elder Hafenstein suggested other bands play as well, the idea took off.

Saturday, after almost two months in the works, their planning finally culminated in a benefit concert and barbecue for Josh. Josh was there, just released from the hospital with a new orthopedic leg.

Several area bands volunteered their time to the benefit, including The Gobofiddlers, who won first prize at the Opus 11 band competition the night before in the Union Ballroom. The band played a long set at the benefit with its mix of blues, rock and ska. They covered classics by Jimi Hendrix, Tom Petty, Creedence Clearwater Revival and others, along with several originals.

Aaron Weisbender, lead vocals and guitar, was glad to play at the benefit.

"It's a wonderful cause," he said. "We were happy to help out."

Other performers included the Pott County Pork and Bean Band, Dark Horse and Laughing Out Loud. Members of the bands signed a drumhead to present to Josh.

"It's amazing how generous area businesses have been, especially Manhattan businesses," Damon Lee, Dark Horse drummer, said.

Caterers donated food to the benefit, including pork, beef, beans and all the trimmings. Josh's cousin, Joel Frank, who sliced meat much of the evening, said they expected to feed about 1,000 people.

Many others volunteered their services to the benefit. Displays included drag racers, mini racers and Shriners' classic cars, two helicopters that flew in from Fort Riley and Topeka and the Topeka Tigers, a semi-pro football team.

Football players from K-State had originally planned to be at the benefit, Marci Gentry, chairman of the Community Missions Fund in Alma, said they had to back out because it would have been a NCAA recruitment violation.

Next to an autographed picture of the Topeka Tigers was a photo collage of Josh: baby pictures, family pictures, Josh on Santa's lap, Josh at graduation, Josh in the hospital. A picture from a local paper showed him posing in front of an airplane next to the man who flew all the way from an air show in Europe to give him a ride.

▶ Donations. Donations may be made to the Community Missions Fund P.O. Box 430 Alma Kan., 66401

To find Josh at the benefit, one needed only to look for a large group of people milling about. Surrounded always by friends, family and supporters, wearing a K-State baseball cap and the purple football jersey of his favorite Wildcat, No. 50, Travis Ochs, a constant smile lighted Josh's face.

"His spirits have always been really high," his mother said. "He just accepts everything as it comes."

Michael Rusher, senior at Wamego High School and one of Josh's friends, had similar praise for Josh.

"He's cool," he said. "I've

26th ANNUAL BLUEGRASS FESTIVAL INVADES WINFIELD

STORY BY

PHOTOS BY JEFF COOPER

For the 26th year in a row, 17,000 close friends came together to celebrate bluegrass music in the little town of Winfield, Kan.

Although the official name is the Walnut Valley Festival National Flatpickin' Championship, it is known to many as just "Winfield." Located on the Cowley County Fairgrounds, it is a bluegrass festival that draws some of the world's best musicians together every third weekend in September.

Every stringed instrument is represented, from the traditional guitars and banjos to the more exotic dobros and hammered dulcimers. There is even a one-stringed bass made out of the gas tank of a '63 Chevy.

The music is heavy with bluegrass and country styles, but the musicians like to show their range by occasionally branching into old Beatles songs and occasional nursery rhymes.

Winfield is also well known for it's "parkin' lot pickin'": music that is played by the attendees at their campsites late into the night. Sometimes these impromptu performances are so engaging festival-goers have actually been known to miss the stage shows.

In addition to the music, which is everywhere, there are also crafts and food vendors. All manner of musical instruments, many handmade, are available, in addition to other items. Most of the vendors have been coming to Winfield for many years and were invited by word of mouth.

"A friend said he thought we'd do really well here. We had no idea where Winfield, Kan., was, but we came down and liked it a lot," said Paul Shedron, Long Lane, Mo., and owner of Ozark Herbals. Shedron has been coming to Winfield since 1988.

"The atmosphere and the music are wonderful. It's a safe, friendly crowd, and they like our products. We've built a real reputation here," Shedron said.

An unusual addition to the festival compared to others is the massage team. A group of masseuses, who have been coming together for the past seven years, are on hand to provide massages to staff, performers and festival attendees.

"Playing this hard is hard work. You need to relax, and that's what we're here for," Sharon Miklos, Mulvane, Kan., said. "It's great fun, and you get to meet some great people."

For many who make the journey to Winfield, it becomes a tradition. A number of people have been coming for 10 years or more, and a few have been going all 26 years. After a while, they start to be regarded as family by the staff.

One such individual is Bill Barwick from Denver. Barwick works as an emcee, a stage manager and also a performer. He has been attending the festival for 10 years and is only one of three people who act in all three capacities.

"A friend of mine invited me down, I came down only to camp and they put me to work," Barwick said. "This is the most fun one person can have. I get to work with some of the finest performers in the world, and I get to play onstage also."

The overwhelming feeling from regular Winfield-goers is one of homecoming.

"You look forward to it so much," Miklos said. "I start getting things ready a month ahead of time."

"This is the mother church of acoustic music. People come together to be a part of that community. When the reason for coming together is that good, we all get to share in it," Barwick said.

How long the festival will continue is anyone's guess. Rumors in the past indicated that the Walnut Valley Festival might be approaching the end of its lifespan, but those concerns were put aside this year.

"Those of us who hold it dear hope it goes on forever," Balwick said. "I see children 8, 9 years old who know every word to Jon Chapin's songs, and I want them to come back and have the same experience with their children that they're having with their moms and dads. I hope another 17,000 of my closest friends can come enjoy it."

No matter what the long-term future of the festival, for a short while at least, a community is built with excellent bluegrass music at its core and a dedication to keep the tradition alive.

SENATE

He said it was still up to Senate to further the impeachment proceeding.

"Student Senate can say 'I think this was stupid. He learned his lesson. He'll still be a good senator. Let's keep him in the body,'" he said.

Bill Muir, faculty representative to Student Senate and one of the authors of the original bill, submitted an amendment that reduced from all classes of misdemeanor to class A misdemeanors because he said he didn't think it could pass if it included class B and C misdemeanors.

"I am under the opinion that this cannot pass in its current form, and I'm trying to find something that makes a statement that will allow that anybody can impeach anyone at any time," he said.

Muir said if people could say that a conviction of a class A misdemeanor, which is punishable by a fine of not more than $2,500 or more than a year in jail, was not enough reason to start the impeachment process then they should think about it more.

"If you think that anybody convicted of a class A misdemeanor or a felony is entitled to be in this body, then you vote against this amendment."

Student Body President Tim Riemann said there was another reason to vote against the amendment.

"I want to apologize to you because what the authors of this amendment are doing is saying that you guys don't have enough guts to hold yourself to a higher standard," he said. "It's not even a higher standard.

"Let's define what this higher standard is that we're talking about. We're talking about obeying the law. Is that a higher standard or is that the standard?"

Riemann said student government has gotten a bad name because of the actions of a few people.

"In the past four years that I've been at K-State, the four years I've been active in student government, things have happened that put Student Senate on the front page and made us look like losers. Losers! Losers! Losers!

"And under this amendment, none of that is going to change. Nothing has happened in the last four years that's covered under this amendment."

Riemann said the Senate chair had to be mandated to begin impeachment charges because senators in the past would not put their name on an impeachment resolution.

"It has to be written down because when I was a senator, there was no way I was going to put my name on an impeachment bill against another senator. No way," Riemann said.

He said the amendment was not strict enough because college students are not usually convicted of felonies and class A misdemeanors. He said they are most often convicted of class B and C misdemeanors.

"This amendment does nothing. Nothing! Nothing! Nothing! I can't believe this. Because the reason this amendment is up is because they think it's the only way it's going to be passed, and I hope you're insulted.

"They're saying you don't have any guts. They're saying you won't hold yourself to the standard."

Riemann said the amendment was just words on paper.

"Be the people that you know you are, and vote the original bill up. It's very simple. A higher standard is not a dirty word."

expects a few kinks. Konda said he thinks the only real kink so far lies in getting the word out.

"We've put a lot of effort into this tour — we're students too. We have tests and homework, and on top of that we are planning this tour, so we hope that students want to become more educated on where their money is going," Konda said.

To help ensure a positive turnout, Peschka said the committee wanted to be in a public location.

40-15 in K-State's favor.

After Piliptchak returned Dunlevy's serve on the next point, Oklahoma's Knipp hit the ball into the net, resulting in a game and match win for the K-State pair.

Piliptchak, senior from Kiev, Ukraine, said the dispute was handled fairly.

"Anything can happen during the match," Piliptchak said. "We just followed the rules."

Overall, Bietau said his team improved steadily during the invitational.

"I saw a lot of progress through the weekend," Bietau said. "So now we can start the week of practice with a very clear picture."

never heard him complain."

Humor lightened the serious intent of the evening. When Josh made a remark about his orthopedic leg being stiff, Rusher suggested using WD-40. Later, Don Hafenstein joked onstage that Josh had offered to race anyone who wanted to race him.

Josh wants to go to K-State, he said, "if it doesn't cost too much."

With his growing medical expenses, however, money is a concern. With luck, the community will be able to raise the money to cover his expenses.

"We had 2,000 donations before we even started," said Gentry, who helped spearhead the benefit. "One lady handed me a check for $500." She said she hoped the benefit would raise more than $5,000.

Jenny Frank said she was pleased with the event's turnout.

"I couldn't believe it — I was shocked. It was great." She estimated attendance at more than 500 people.

Josh and his family are more optimistic about his condition than before. Josh has been on a new hormone treatment for a month, and it appears to be working.

"We got good news yesterday that the tumor is not growing, which is the best thing we've heard so far," his mother said.

The evening's sentiment was perhaps best expressed in the words of Carla Stovall, Kansas attorney general, on a signed picture on display next to Josh's photo collage:

"Josh — You are my hero — I admire your strength. Best wishes."

LACROSSE

K-State is part of the Great Plains Lacrosse League, which includes Tulsa, Wichita State, Kansas, Rockhurst and a pro team from Kansas City.

According to Sweet, K-State's team didn't play as well as they could have this weekend.

"We played real well Saturday, but Sunday we had trouble with the basics like scooping and passing. Our guys tried hard and played hard, and I am proud of them. We were down 8-1 at halftime so we outscored them 5-3 in the second half. We just got off to a terrible start.

"We really did not get beat that badly. Eleven-6 is not that big of a deficit in lacrosse," Sweet said.

Despite not winning the tournament, Sweet said it was a fun and successful weekend.

"It was a great tournament, and everything went really well," Sweet said. "We would like to thank all the sponsors and would especially like to thank all the people who came out and watched and supported us."

Commerce to implement check-cashing fee

UGB APPROVES MOTION TO ALLOW COMMERCE BANK TO CHARGE POSSIBLE 50-CENT FEE TO CASH CHECKS

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

The days of free check cashing in the K-State Student Union will be over in January. But it has not been decided how much Commerce Bank will charge for the service.

Commerce proposed a 75-cent fee for cashing checks during the Union Governing Board meeting Monday. This fee would be placed on all non-Commerce checks and non-state-issued payroll checks.

Those with Commerce accounts would not be charged for the service. The maximum amount for these checks would be $50.

The board agreed a fee was necessary but did not agree on the charge the bank proposed.

"I have a real problem with Commerce Bank making a profit off the service," said UGB Vice President Wendy Strevey Tien, senior in secondary education and psychology.

UGB approved a motion 9-1 that would allow the bank to charge 50 cents for the check-cashing service with a review of the service set for the final meeting of the UGB in spring 1998. Commerce will have to decide whether to accept the motion.

The initial proposal would have allowed Commerce to make a net profit of $1,000 per year from the service.

"Seventy-five cents is as close as we could go to break even," said Ted Giller, Commerce Bank representative.

Bank representatives said the fee will not be enacted until Jan. 1, but they will begin providing notification immediately about the change.

"We traditionally haven't charged to cash checks," said Bernard Pitts, Union director. "The $39,000 expense for cashing checks last year was spread throughout campus privilege fees."

Students have already been paying for the service, Pitts said. The new fee is essentially taking the cost of the service away from the Union and placing it in the hands of the students.

"A number of students who never or seldom cashed checks were paying for the service," said Ted Haggart, Commerce Bank representative. "We don't have the latitude to have a flat

Student Publications concerned about equipment fee proposal

SARA BURDETTE
staff reporter

Concern that the Student Publications Equipment Fee Budget would not be judged fairly by Privilege Fee Committee and Student Senate was expressed by the director of Student Publications Inc. at the Privilege Fee Committee meeting Monday.

"We are a little skeptical of the fee process," Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications, said.

Jeff Dougan, Student Senate chair, said the committee and Senate reviewed fees in a professional manner.

"Every fee is looked at fairly and ethically," Dougan said.

Brandon Konda, committee member and arts and sciences senator, said he agreed that both the committee and Senate will be fair.

"Everyone here is objective. I think that it is insulting to say it's not," Konda said.

A head-on collision on a southeast Kansas highway Friday afternoon claimed the life of Topeka freshman Quinn Marie Dauphin.

Dauphin, a 1997 graduate of Washburn Rural High School, was traveling south toward Pittsburg, Kan., on U.S. Highway 69 when she attempted to pass a 1985 Freightliner semi-tractor-trailer truck driven by James Brown, 47, of Asbury, Mo.

She collided with a northbound 1993 Chevrolet Blazer driven by James Shoemaker, 59, of Prescott, Kan., when both vehicles moved to the east shoulder of the road to avoid each other.

Dauphin's 1997 Nissan then hit the southbound tractor-trailer.

The Kansas Highway Patrol said Dauphin died at Mercy Hospital in Fort Scott, Kan. Shoemaker and his wife, Lois, were also taken to Mercy Hospital. The driver of the semi was not injured.

Dauphin and Brown were wearing seat belts, a highway patrol spokesperson said. The Shoemakers were not.

Dauphin lived on the fourth floor of Moore Hall. Before that she had been very active during her high school years.

Former fellow cheerleaders at WRHS left the football field during Friday night's home game after hearing the news.

Sources said Monday a campus memorial service was a possibility, but a confirmation or information about plans for such a service were not available at press time.

Air Force starts 24-hour pause to stress safety

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Air Force suspended training flights for combat air crews at domestic bases Monday to focus on safety issues arising from a recent string of accidents.

The rest of the Air Force, including transport and tanker units and warplanes based abroad, will suspend training flights for 24 hours on Friday.

The Air Force had planned a servicewide halt of training flights for Friday, but Air Combat Command, which operates all fighters and bombers at domestic bases, decided to move it up to Monday after one of its B-1 bombers crashed in Montana.

"It's important to remind each individual in the Air Force of the importance of what they do," Air Force Secretary Sheila Widnall told the Associated Press. "This will allow our people to reflect on their mission."

She said she was confident the one-day halt to normal flying routines, known as a stand-down, will make Air Force operations safer. Despite the recent crashes, the Air Force's overall safety record for the past year has been one of its best ever.

The Navy, Marine Corps and Army are scheduled to take a similar one-day stand-down before the end of this week. Defense Secretary William Cohen last week ordered a militarywide stand-down for a period of reflection on safety.

It is the first-ever suspension of all military pilot training. Cohen's order does not affect operational flights such as those over Iraq and in support of Bosnia peacekeeping.

In a statement issued Sunday from his headquarters at Langley Air Force Base, Va., Gen. Richard Hawley said the one-day pause was needed to "focus intently on what we do and how we do it.

"We need to determine why these incidents happened and how to prevent any more mishaps," said Hawley, who is commander of Air Combat Command. The command has 1,056 aircraft at 28 installations in the United States and Panama.

Despite a steady drop in the number of U.S. military air crashes since 1994, six crashes in the past week have left officials looking for answers. The six crashes since Sept. 14 bring the total number of crashes for 1997 to 55 as of Friday. The total for 1994 was 86.

SEPT. 14
Two military aircraft are assumed to have collided off the Atlantic coast of southern Africa near the country of Namibia. Wreckage from the American C-141 transport plane, carrying nine people, and the German Air Force plane, carrying 24 people, was found Tuesday. One body was recovered. 32 remain missing.

SEPT. 14
Four civilians and one pilot suffered minor injuries when an Air Force F-117A stealth fighter jet crashed into a residential area in a suburb of Baltimore. The jet was performing in an air show when a piece of a wing broke off. The pilot was forced to eject.

SEPT. 14
A pilot was killed when his U.S. Navy FA-18 crashed in Oman.

SEPT. 15
During a standard bombing exercise, a Marine FA-18D Hornet fighter jet crashed in a North Carolina swamp near Cape Hatteras. Both crew members were killed in the crash.

SEPT. 16
There were no fatalities when two Air Force F-16 fighter jets collided over the Atlantic Ocean 60 miles southeast of Atlantic City. Though a jet made it safely back to the base after the collision, the other crashed into the sea.

FRIDAY
A U.S. Air Force B-1 bomber, based out of South Dakota, crashed into a Montana prairie for undetermined reasons. All four crew members were killed in the crash.

Homecoming bone-marrow drive yields donor

▶ The requirements.
The National Marrow Donor Program has established guidelines donors must meet in order to donate.
- Be between 18 and 60 years old
- Be willing to go through further testing if selected
- Be willing to donate to any patient searching the registry

Need more info?
Call the National Marrow Donor Program at (800) 366-6710 or (800) MARROW-2.

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

The harvest produces great yields, but the selection isn't good.

When Jennifer Anderson, fifth-year student in elementary education, decided to register to be a bone-marrow donor her chances of being matched were slim.

Anderson and two of her friends decided to participate in the bone-marrow drive for the Sigma Kappa sorority during the 1994 Homecoming.

"I didn't expect to get picked," she said. "I was told I would have a one in 10 chance when picked to go any further."

Anderson donated her life-saving bone marrow on Aug. 21, just before starting her classes.

After a preliminary match, the bone-marrow registry contacted Anderson for approval and to begin screening.

More blood work, a full physical, EKG, and urine and blood tests followed. After she was approved, she and her parents waited to harvest her bone marrow.

Anderson said they took the marrow from her pelvic bones, the process was painless, and she had no discomfort or side effects. She said the process took almost an hour, and she went home the next day.

> "I think everybody should do it. There are people out there that this is their last resort to life."
> • Jennifer Anderson
> bone marrow donor and fifth-year student in elementary education

Anderson said the process is easy and involves no out-of-pocket expenses for the donor.

"I think everybody should do it," she said. "There are people out there that this is their last resort to life."

Anderson was participating in the Heart of America National Marrow Donor Program.

The regional registry is in Kansas City, Mo., and the registry participates in annual college marrow drives.

Bone-marrow transplants are used as treatment of leukemia, aplastic anemia and other life-threatening blood diseases.

Diane Lux, manager for donor recruitment for Heart of America, said the regional registry sponsors drives mostly in Kansas.

"We service KU, K-State, MU, jucos and K-State at Salina," Lux said.

Lux said K-State has shown a good response to its drives. The registry has close to 1,000 students from K-State for the past five years in its database.

"We focus mainly on the greek system at K-State," Lux said.

Lux said because greeks are encouraged to participate in these events the turnout is usually good. She said participation is open to the public and everyone is invited.

The National Marrow Donor Program said patients' best chances for matched donors are within the family and then within their racial or ethnic groups.

The donor program said primarily Caucasians donate and encourage people of all racial and ethnic groups to participate to improve the chances of minorities needing transplants.

Ole Miss sleepovers idea falls flat

JACKSON, Miss. — The right to have overnight visitors of the opposite sex is but a dream to students in the residence halls at the University of Mississippi.

A new policy allowing sleepovers on weekends was scheduled to take effect last weekend but was scrapped by university officials amid complaints from parents, state lawmakers and religious leaders.

"They caught somebody sleeping on that one. That's bad, bad, bad policy," said state Sen. Hillman Frazier. "We're still the Bible Belt. Some things are a no-no in our state, especially when it deals with state tax dollars."

No college in Mississippi allows men and women to share residence halls overnight. Public colleges in neighboring Alabama and Louisiana have similar bans.

Paul Jones, a Baptist leader in the state, is familiar with open-style residence halls after serving as a campus minister at two Texas colleges from 1970 to 1981. The schools had coed halls, he said, "What was tried as a social experiment in the '60s, '70s, into the '80s died away. It was abused by all the participants.

"It's like Ole Miss is dragging up something that hasn't proved successful in many other locations," he said. "In a time of increasing concern about HIV, sexually transmitted diseases, sexual assault and problem pregnancies, to invite that type of activity flies in the face of everything our society is addressing."

16-year-old escapes by using sharpened toothbrush

NEW ULM, Minn. — A 16-year-old boy escaped from a juvenile detention center by holding a sharpened toothbrush to a jailer's throat and attacked a man with a golf club before being recaptured Monday, police said.

The teen-ager, whose name was not released, had been at the detention center on attempted murder charges for allegedly shooting a police officer at a high school Sept. 11. The officer was grazed in the forehead.

On Sunday night, the boy held a sharpened toothbrush to a jailer's throat and demanded her car keys, but the woman had taken her bicycle to work that day, police Sgt. Erv Weinkauf said. The teen-ager got another worker to let him out, released the jailer and ran off.

Early Monday, police said, the boy hit a man in the face with a golf club in the victim's garage as he was heading to work. The boy, who police said had apparently been hiding in the garage to keep dry, was arrested in an alley nearby.

Murder suspect assumes identity of fellow prisoner, walks away

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A murder suspect assumed the identity of a fellow prisoner who was being released and walked away from the city jail during the weekend.

Monday, police were looking for David D. Stewart, 29, who was arrested just 26 hours before he escaped Sunday. He was charged Sept. 10 with first-degree murder and armed criminal action in the Aug. 24 shooting death of Leodis McCray II.

According to police, Stewart traded identification bracelets with the 26-year-old fellow prisoner and memorized his Social Security number and birth date.

Jail officials do not verify fingerprints of departing prisoners because it takes too long, Sgt. Troy Entrop said. They do ask for the Social Security number, birth date and age. Officials also have a physical description of each prisoner and note what each was wearing when entering jail, Entrop said.

Police kill rampaging elephant

NEW DELHI, India — A rebellious elephant trampled its owner to death and destroyed nearly 100 huts in a New Delhi shantytown before being shot and killed by police.

Nearly 30 policemen tried to corral the elephant Saturday as it rampaged along the banks of New Delhi's Yamuna River, the Indian Express newspaper reported Monday. One person was hospitalized with injuries, police said.

Environmentalist Maneka Gandhi criticized police, saying they should have used tranquilizer darts instead of killing the elephant.

"(Elephants) are made to work all day, carrying heavy loads and walking in the hot sun and tarred roads. It is no wonder that these animals go mad," Gandhi told the Express.

Smoking areas restricted in Manhattan, on campus

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff reporter

Smoke. Some people gag when they hear the word. Other people crave it no matter what time of day it is.

Smoking has become a smoldering topic at K-State and many Manhattan businesses. Some places allow smoking, but other places strictly prohibit it.

"It's tough for people to decide whose rights should win out," Erica Bowden, sophomore in architectural engineering, said. "If there is an area, the non-smokers feel their rights to fresh air are violated. If there isn't an area, smokers feel neglected."

K-State's policy on smoking is certainly clear: Because smoking is a potential public health and fire hazard, it shall be restricted to prevent infringements upon others.

Smoking is prohibited in all buildings except in designated areas. All buildings must have signs on entrances stating that "Smoking is prohibited except in designated areas."

Jody Peterson, senior in criminology, said the policy makes smoking inconvenient.

"I'm a smoker. I don't mind smoking outside, but there should be somewhere inside, too," Peterson said. "In the winter it's pretty darn cold outside."

The Manhattan Town Center approved a policy last summer prohibiting smoking anywhere inside its facilities. Mall officials also said they felt too many potential customers were feeling uncomfortable with the cigarette smoke.

Jessie Cabral, senior in Spanish, said she feels uncomfortable around smokers.

"I believe second-hand smoke is bad for me," Cabral said. "If there is a medium where everyone can be happy, that's fine. I just don't want it in my face."

All of the bars in Manhattan allow smoking. Non-smokers, like Cabral, often find it inconvenient.

"That is one of the reasons I go to Last Chance. They have an outdoor area," Cabral said.

Students are not the only ones who must abide by K-State's smoking policy. K-State faculty must also comply with the public policy. Yet, faculty can smoke in private offices.

"It's a little unfair they can sit inside where it is nice. Smoking outside in the wintertime is miserable for some people, but I guess that's life," Bowden said.

Smoking is not permitted in hallways, restrooms, classrooms, elevators and areas of public assembly. Smoking is not allowed in the K-State Student Union, but the Union sells cigarettes.

The controversy about smoking areas and non-smoking areas will undoubtedly go on.

"People will probably squabble over it for years to come," Bowden said. "As long as people can compromise, everything will work out one way or another."

Lafene prepares for festival

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

The fifth annual Festival of Health will be from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Wednesday on the front lawn of Lafene Health Center.

Linda Wertzberger, LPN in the Women's Clinic and committee chairperson, said it is a way to inform the students of the many services at Lafene and a chance to give something back to the students.

"A lot of times the kids just aren't aware of what we have here," Wertzberger said. "It's not just coming in if you have a cold."

For example, Wertzberger said many students don't realize there is a counseling center that offers at least two free counseling sessions, dietitians and other specialty departments.

Wertzberger said there will be a chance to sign up for door prizes at each booth, a putting game, horseshoes, croquet, free lemonade and popcorn, and free giveaways from coupons to samples.

In addition, health issues will be tied in whenever they can.

"Each department will have a booth and will be there to answer questions," Wertzberger said.

The Women's Clinic will have a video about women's issues and trivia about preventative measures in a facts-vs.-myths form.

Many local businesses and pharmaceutical companies donated to the event. Wertzberger said out of all the companies she called for the event, she received a positive response from all but two.

Cindy Burke, director of health education and promotion, said the mission of the festival would be the same as in the past.

"We're trying to educate students on what services are available," Burke said. "It's amazing how many students don't know that we're here and what they've paid for (in fees), and that is our mission."

Puerto Rican Baila Folkloric Dancers represent culture

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

Bright, colorful costumes and a rich tradition are trademarks of the Puerto Rican Baila Folkloric Dancers.

The group was founded in April 1992 by Luis Figuera, K-State graduate, and Arleen Baiges, senior in civil engineering. Figuera has moved on, and Baiges now directs the group.

Baiges said they started the group because there was a need for people to see the differences between dances and traditions in different countries.

"Luis and I were talking about the Pan American dancers and the former Latin American Student Organization and thought there was a need for people to see dancers from Puerto Rico," Baiges said.

The two started a dance group that specializes in traditional dances from Puerto Rico. The group has performed the salsa, merengue and danza in the past and will perform the plena and the bomba this year.

Baiges said the dances are influenced by African, Taino and Spanish heritages.

"We try to stick with folkloric dances, but if the group wants to do popular dances we do them if we have time," Baiges said.

The dancers have performed for multicultural student organization events and at the National Collegiate Conference. While at the conference, they accepted an invitation to perform at the University of California at Fullerton. They have also performed for students at Fort Riley and Junction City high schools.

The group performs two to three events a semester on the evenings and weekends. Members plan to perform the third week of October at Latin American Cultural Night for Hispanic Heritage Month.

Vilmarie Rodriguez, dancer and second-year student in veterinary medicine, said she became interested in the group after attending a performance with a friend.

"I think it's important for Puerto Ricans to have contact with U.S. citizens and to show them how different our culture is," Rodriguez said.

The group does not receive any funding for costumes, clothes, accessories or travel.

"In the beginning we paid for our costumes out-of-pocket," Baiges said. "Then we were reimbursed when conferences started and honorariums were paid."

The group consists of three to four couples and is composed of Puerto Ricans and one Argentinean. Past members have been from Ecuador, Argentina, Mexico and Costa Rica.

There is no limit to the amount of people who can join the group.

"Anyone interested can join," Baiges said. "People who want to learn about Puerto Rican folklore and dancing are welcome."

Oscar Perez, first-year student at the American Institute of Baking, said joining the group was a way to combine dance and meeting people. Perez said it's difficult to find women who know how to do complicated footwork.

"I joined the group so I can perhaps find friends who like to dance tango with me," he said.

Baiges said both males and females are welcome to join, but she stresses they always need males in the group.

Interested in joining?
Anyone interested in joining the Puerto Rican Baila Folkloric Dancers can call the Multicultural Student Organization office at 532-6436.

The group practices two hours a week in Justin 149.

Other group members include Janirka Rodriguez, first-year student in veterinary medicine, and Fernando Pagan, senior in architecture.

Parking woes could be alleviated by relocating visitor spaces

Circling.

Circling.

Insert expletive here.

Circling.

We all know how awesome K-State is, and so do all the hordes of organizations and schools statewide who want to come here to have conferences. The drawback to our popularity is the parking spots that inevitably get gobbled up by big yellow school buses and cars that usually aren't here.

And it's hardly a secret that Parking Services sells more parking permits to students and faculty than there are available spaces. Thus, parking the ol' hoopty is doubly challenging.

So, for those students who have laid down their hard-earned bread for a parking pass just to search endlessly for a spot, the situation needs a little doctoring.

The solution seems almost too easy for conference parking. Let's talk about parking those monstrous, five-space-eating buses and other vehicles out at the KSU Stadium and busing the conference-goers in.

But the rarity of finding parking at K-State being about as rare as an episode of "F-Troop" being funny has something to do with students as well.

It's time to start thinking about our fellow students, particularly the ones who don't live within a mile radius of campus. If you know you're going to live close to campus, just don't buy a parking permit. That way, you leave spots free for folks who really need them.

If you find you need to drive to school, follow the example of others and carpool with your roommates or neighbors. More spots will be left free, and you'll be bettering the overall demeanor of those around you.

And for all you motorcycle riders, please park in those handy little stalls designed just for you. You won't find a car crammed into your spaces, so please don't take up regular car spaces.

Finally, if you live within a mile of campus, just throw your warm undies on and hike it on up to school. You'll do yourself and everyone else a favor.

TODAY'S HEALTH CARE SYSTEM MAKES A GOOD DOCTOR HARD TO FIND

KRIS EMMONS/Collegian

You don't trust your doctor? Join the club.

Last year I went to a dermatologist to have a plantar's wart removed — that's a localized hardening of the sole of the foot caused by a papillomavirus. I had gone to him hoping he'd pull out some liquid nitrogen and freeze the damned thing off since I had been walking on it for three months. Every step felt like treading on a nail.

Instead he gave me a packet of disposable stylettes, told me to buy some Duofilm and treat it myself. He told me it would go away within two weeks. Four months later I had to remove it myself using rubbing alcohol and cuticle scissors.

The economic incentive for sending me off to get Duofilm was obvious. That made for a short consultation and this doctor charges a flat consultation fee. The more consultations he has in a day, the more money he rakes in, and the better his ability to pay tuition for two college-age children.

So when I went to my primary-care doctor a few months later, complaining of perpetual nasal congestion resulting from a severe ragweed allergy, my foot was still smarting from my amateur surgery. I felt I could not afford to trust him. In fact I had to be dragged to the consultation.

I wasn't surprised when he prescribed a corticosteroid nasal spray. Cortisone and its derivatives are treated by the medical profession as sovereign remedies for inflammation of every kind, although the mechanisms by which they relieve pain are poorly understood.

As the package insert for the spray says, "Although the precise mechanism of glucocorticoid antiallergic action is unknown, glucocorticoids are very effective." Almost every disease or physical condition involving inflammation which is described in the American Medical Association Encyclopedia, has corticosteroids listed as a treatment.

The problem with these steroid derivatives, however, is extreme mood swings. When they are used to treat chronic inflammation, the dosages have to be pared down to an absolute minimum in order to avoid psychiatric side effects. Prednisone is the current anti-inflammatory drug of choice for diseases ranging from Crohn's disease to brushes with poison ivy. In doses above 10 mg daily, it causes extreme mood swings.

The medication in my nose spray, triamcinolone acetonide, is eight times stronger than prednisone and the daily dosage I take corresponds to 1.76 mg of prednisone.

Being within one order of magnitude of the psychoactive dose was too close for me, especially since I thought I had been brushed off again with another boilerplate treatment.

So I buried the spray at the bottom of a crate I use to carry bathroom necessities like soap and decided to continue suffering.

But last Wednesday I was so miserable I finally had to dig it out and use it as prescribed. The results have been astonishing. For the first time in weeks, I have been able to go outside without going into anaphylactic shock. So far I have experienced only one mood swing — up, probably resulting from being able to breathe freely without obstruction, sneezing or nasal drip.

Clearly my decision not to trust my primary care doctor, who turned out to be competent, was completely irrational. It was not based upon an assessment of his record as a doctor and turned out to be unjustified.

But the overriding point here is that the medical profession simply does not furnish patients with the tools they need in order to choose doctors.

Statistics of any kind dealing with how doctors do their jobs and how well they do it are hard to come by. In most states, for instance, a pregnant woman cannot find out how obstetricians prefer to deliver babies — by natural childbirth or Caesarean section.

This means that patients have to rely upon word-of-mouth, which they rightly distrust since it is notoriously unreliable. I have heard other patients highly recommend the dermatologist who blew me off with a prescription for Duofilm.

In this situation where the entire medical profession circles its wagons and protects its incompetent practitioners, forcing patients to choose physicians based on notoriously unreliable anecdotal evidence and financially motivated referrals, is it surprising that many people can't trust doctors?

A system that requires patients to second-guess their medical advisers using the Physician's Desk Reference and drug package inserts is not a functional, well-regulated health care system.

The health-care crisis continues

CAPITALISM SHOULD PLAY A BIGGER ROLE IN THE MEDICAL WORLD

Most Americans are unaware of our nation's health-care crisis. President Clinton put it in the spotlight in his 1992 presidential campaign, but the idea of health-care reform and the imminent crisis disappeared from most of our eyes after his flawed health-care reform plan was killed off by Congress.

However, it is inevitable that Congress will once again see major health reform legislation because we are at the very start of a health-care crisis. Congress only postponed the problem. It is unfortunate that we must suffer from this crisis before we will react to it.

Our nation's health cost is increasing at an incredible rate. From 1970 to 1990, the expense of hospital care increased 731 percent — it jumped from $27.9 to $231.8 billion. The price of medication increased 406 percent — it jumped from $8.8 to $44.6 billion.

The cost of health care is terribly outpacing inflation. Standing by itself, our health-care industry would be the eighth-largest economy in the world.

Small-and medium-sized businesses, which comprise most of the employment in the United States, will soon no longer be able to afford health coverage for their employees. Many people will soon be without insurance.

The health-care cost will also become a huge expense for the government from the Medicare and Medicaid programs, especially after the baby boomers retire and tap into the Medicare system. The huge debt created from these programs will once again prompt the President and Congress to reform health care.

The worst solution to this problem is for the government to completely take over the health system, such as in Clinton's failed plan. We are all aware of our government's bureaucracy, which is very inefficient.

The solution to health care is easy, once you see what's causing the problems. The biggest problem with our health-care industry is that there is no capitalism.

People do not shop around for the lowest health-care prices. We will spend 10 minutes at the grocery store deciding which can of beans is the best deal, but we will use doctors, medications and medical procedures without a thought to cost or an incentive for comparison shopping.

Most of us don't shop around because we are insured. We go to the doctor's office, get what we need, and then let the insurance company pay for it, completely overlooking the cost.

Even if we did shop around for health care, it would be very difficult to find prices. Hospitals and doctors don't advertise or list their prices. Have you ever heard of a hospital having a sale on hip replacements?

It does sound a bit crazy, but capitalism is exactly what is needed.

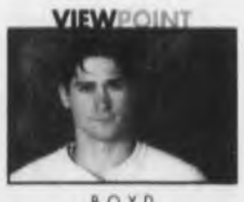
Without capitalism in the health-care industry, hospitals and doctors can charge whatever they want with no fear of losing business.

A lot of us are also to blame for the inflated health prices. Many people go to the doctor for the most trivial things. If they get a slight fever, the sniffles or any other type of common cold, they immediately run to the doctor's office to get checked out and receive medication.

However, they are just wasting their time and health-care money. There is no cure for the common cold. Sure, the doctors will prescribe you antibiotics, but they only do that to shut up potential ill-tempered complainers who think they need medication.

Viruses cause common colds and the antibiotics that are prescribed only work against bacterial infections. If people had to pay more for health services, they would stop running to the hospital for trivial, pointless things like the common cold, which puts a big drain on our health system.

The solution to our health-care crisis is capitalism. We must turn the health-care market into a capitalistic market instead of the current socially based market. Insurance shouldn't pay for almost the entire health expense.



The reduction in insurance price coverage will force people to shop around for the better deal. However, doctors and hospitals must show prices for their procedures. With advertised prices and people shopping around, the health-care market will become capitalistic.

Despite my dislike for government regulations, the only way to get this plan off the ground is for the government to enforce it. I just hope that the regulation write-up doesn't kill a few trees.

We have a health-care crisis. It will once again become a political spotlight after employers drop their employees' health coverage due to the increased costs. Also, the government will feel the heat from paying Medicare benefits for the soon-to-be retired baby boomers.

From the government's actions, we will make the health-care industry capitalistic, which will control and stop the incredibly increasing prices of health care.

Collegian opinion page should foster religious rhetoric

Editor,

I disagree with Keith Tate's letter in the Sept. 18 Collegian calling for fewer religious columns in the editorial section. I have enjoyed the ideas presented in the editorial section, both religious and secular.

I am also an alumna who enjoys reading the Collegian online. But I realized that the purpose of an "editorial" section is to present opinions, whether they be about religion or any other topic. Religion has been seen as news from the foundation of our country, which is part of the reason freedom of religion is included in the Bill of Rights, along with free speech and free press.

If Tate does not want to see columns that deal with religious issues, he can just skip over them. No one is forcing him or anyone else to read them.

Columns nothing more than pointless religious dribble

Editor,

Isn't anyone else offended when they peruse the Collegian and daily find an endless dribble of religious quibbles? This stuff isn't news, it's personal propaganda.

Maybe the Collegian, not to mention all those seemingly frustrated seminarians, er, I mean, students, should recall the "State" in Kansas State University. Ours is a public, secular institution. Those who wish to beat their religions' drums via the campus newspaper should transfer to a private, religious institution instead.

Gregory Leet

Column untruthful about ideals of the Islamic tradition

Editor,

I would implore the writer of the column on the Nation of Islam to conform to the standards of his or her profession by reporting the truth.

The information given about the Nation of Islam is inflammatory, as well as absolutely wrong.

To begin, members of the Nation of Islam do practice the five pillars of Islam and are very disciplined in doing so. We do not feel that our religion is a public thing, and often we choose to make our prayers, fast, and pay charity without a lot of fanfare.

It would behoove the writer to speak with some members of the Nation of Islam or take some time to do basic research beginning with some of the books and information put out by the Nation of Islam.

It is apparent that the writer is 100 percent ignorant of anything except derogatory and untrue statements about the Nation of Islam.

It is OK to report on the Nation of Islam, but it is not OK to lie, misrepresent and blatantly disregard the truth.

Multicultural sponsor strives to relate to minority students

ASHLEY YOULE
staff reporter

Dawnielle Robinson has been named the new coordinator for multicultural student organizations at K-State.

A former K-State student, Robinson said she was ready for the challenge of being a part of K-State's faculty.

Robinson received her master's degree in creative writing from K-State in May. She said she was excited to put her skills to work helping numerous campus organizations.

Prior to taking the job, Robinson was offered a teaching job in Kansas City. She said she felt a lot of things needed to be done at K-State, and she wanted to be the one to get the ball rolling.

"I wasn't sure teaching was for me," Robinson said. "I enjoy getting to know so many students. They make my job so much fun it doesn't feel like I'm working."

Even though she is no longer a student, Robinson said she can relate to the students on their level. She said she knows what it feels like to be the only minority in a class.

As the coordinator, Robinson sees her office as the umbrella for all campus multicultural organizations. In her office, organizations such as the Black Student Union and the Hispanic American Leadership Organization can plan events, arrange speakers and organize activities.

Her role with these organizations is to be their sponsor, to help plan events and to help keep things running smoothly.

Angel Harris, a graduate student in sociology, is an assistant to Robinson and said he is very excited to be working with her.

"We're both new in this office, and we have a busy month ahead of us," Harris said. "Dawnielle has been a huge help in the office."

One way Robinson assists the organizations is by staying committed to the students. She tries to attend almost every meeting and activity the different groups have in hopes they get to know her better.

"Many students don't know I'm here," she said. "I want to be visible to these students so they know they can always come to me with questions or problems."

With this attitude, Robinson has already made an impression on one student.

Manomay Malathip, senior in marketing, met Robinson at a recent HALO meeting.

"She was very helpful and seemed interested in what we were doing," Malathip said.

In addition to being there for the students, Robinson has many new ideas to bring to the campus, in hopes that more minorities get involved.

One of the Robinson's long-term goals is to start a multicultural newsletter. Robinson said this would allow students to have the opportunity to write about multicultural events, and it would give her the chance to work with students who possess writing talents.

An even more important goal Robinson would like to achieve is to advocate cohesiveness between all multicultural groups. She would like to see everyone support one another, bringing the groups closer together.

Ultimately, Robinson would like to see more minorities involved with campus activities such as Homecoming. She said she feels the campus is losing students who aren't into group activities.

"It's going to take some active planning and creative thinking," she said, "but it's nothing we can't handle."

Bracelets promote Christian beliefs

▶ Look it up on the World Wide Web. To find out more information about the "What Would Jesus Do?" bracelets point your web browser to www.ccci.org.

LANDON TRAWNEY
staff reporter

Christian students on campus are wearing bracelets to promote their beliefs and to serve as "reminders" of how to live a good life.

The bracelets are marked with "WWJD," which stands for "What Would Jesus Do?"

Eric Finch, junior in computer science and art, said the bracelets remind students to make Christ-like decisions.

"No one is perfect, but this reminds us to strive for something better," Finch said.

John Schmoll, K-State alumnus, said the WWJD bracelet also helps turn bad situations into good ones.

He pointed out that everyone should look at what Jesus would do in a problematic situation and try it.

Schmoll said he has seen more of the WWJD bracelets appearing on campus. He has also seen more people wearing them at the Bible studies he co-leads in Van Zile and Putnam halls.

> junior in computer science and art

Barbara Caddy, employee at Christian Books and Gifts, said the sale of the bracelets has been gaining momentum.

She said Christian Books and Gifts has sold 254 of the WWJD bracelets since February.

"That doesn't include the number of pendants, key rings, T-shirts and hats. It's the biggest craze in awhile," Caddy said.

Caddy said the sale of the WWJD bracelets has increased since students started returning from Christian summer camps, leadership conferences, and youth seminars where the bracelets were a rather popular item.

Schmoll bought his WWJD bracelet in Alaska, when he traveled there for an 11-week project with the campus Christian organization, Campus Crusade for Christ.

Although Finch does not have a WWJD bracelet yet, he said he is planning to get one.

"It's a chance to share beliefs," he said. "It's just like shirts that say '311,' but ours say 'WWJD.'"

Ticket trauma

Damaged student general admission tickets can be replaced

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff reporter

One tiny piece of paper must withstand minor rips, big tears, pouring rain and student neglect. Bends and creases will slowly take its toll on this delicate but important piece of paper.

Why should everyone begin giving extra attention to this valuable document? Because it is a K-State football season ticket.

Instead of having individual tickets for every home game, there is a single ticket that students must keep throughout the course of the season. Having one ticket means students must take good care of their season passes.

But for those people who have already washed or torn their tickets, it's not the end of the world.

Carol Adolph, athletic ticket manager, said tickets can be replaced in some cases.

"If students can present us with their old ticket in its entirety, and we can see that it needs to be replaced, we will exchange their old ticket for a new ticket," she said.

Students have complained that the ticket is too large to fit in an ID holder, forcing them to pocket it repeatedly.

Tammy Reinecke, junior in social work, doesn't think her ticket will last the length of the season.

"I went to the first game, and I put my ticket in my pocket because I didn't have anywhere else to put it," Reinecke said.

"Now it's all crumpled and bent. I can't believe this tiny thing is expected to last us through the wear and tear of the whole season."

Reinecke said she believes it is only fair that the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics replace damaged season tickets.

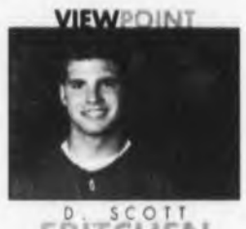
"I can understand not replacing individual tickets, but having to withstand the rain and snow is too much to ask," Reinecke said. "I'm there to cheer for the Cats, not worry about the safety of my ticket."

The new punch-card ticket will probably undergo some changes in the near future, Adolph said.

"We were disappointed in the way that they turned out," she said. "The quality wasn't as good as we thought it would be. In fact, we are even seeing if we can change the tickets before basketball season arrives."

Adolph said the move to sell tickets as a single punch-card stemmed from recommendations made by a student athletic sales committee.

"A panel of people decided that we should go to a punch-card ticket," Adolph said. "The reason is to keep students from selling tickets to the general public. Student tickets are for students only."



Leslie Toby, junior in marketing, said she doesn't like the fact that she can't give individual tickets to her friends.

"My friends come to visit me from other schools, and tickets are already sold out. I can't get tickets for my friends because nobody will give up their season pass."

Nebraska saves face for Big 12 after convincing win over Huskies

Thank you, Nebraska.

Thank you for saving the Big 12 for another week. Thank you for being the underdog, proving the country wrong and increasing the Big 12's two-year record against ranked non-conference teams to 2-8.

It was just two Saturdays ago that the Big 12 celebrated its worst weekend in its short history.

Nebraska was down at halftime to Central Florida. K-State beat Ohio by three points. With an embarrassing combined score of 93-9 in their losses, Texas and Colorado not only proved to the nation the Big 12 is not the best conference in the nation, they proved the Big 12 is behind the curve.

"Behind the curve" is a Snyderism defined in the Book of Snyder. "Behind the curve" is how head football coach Bill Snyder defines K-State's offense after two games. So, "behind the curve" is also how to define the Big 12's performance so far.

The Southeastern Conference leads the nation with a 27-9 record and has all 12 teams bragging to the nation about the fact that they all are over .500. The Big 10 is playing better than the Big 12 at this point. So is the PAC-10. The Big 12 is 20-14 as a conference, winning 59 percent of its games.

"Obviously, we're not setting the world on fire at this point in time," Snyder said. "My perception is that we're not as strong as was projected."

Nebraska. Texas. Colorado. K-State. Texas A&M.

These are the big dogs. These are the teams that are supposed to dominate opponents. These are the teams opposing coaches circle on their schedules and stick all across the locker room and have nightmares about for weeks.

This weekend, No. 16 Colorado, No. 18 K-State and Texas had the weekend off. They were able to lick their wounds for this week's non-conference play.

Texas A&M regained respect against Southwestern Louisiana with a 66-0 drubbing and moved into No. 22 in the polls.

And all the Big 12 watched as Nebraska played and regained the nation's respect.

Nebraska played big on Saturday. It beat Washington 27-14 before a nation of critics. This was Washington's year to shine. It was its turn to win the big game.

For Nebraska, the win was a step toward the national championship. It was the biggest victory in Big 12 history. It was Washington's sixth loss at home in 46 games.

The Big 12's remaining non-conference foes, Wyoming, Bowling Green, Ohio State, Louisville, Northeast Louisiana, Rice and North Texas, compiled a whopping 14-12 record.

Missouri will play host to No. 7 Ohio State on Saturday. Don't hold your breath for the Tigers to post another ranked non-conference win this season.

Texas A&M can't take North Texas lightly in Irving, Texas. Forget the betting line. North Texas has won two games in a row. Four of the six Big 12 South teams haven't. North Texas beat Texas Tech 30-27 on Saturday.

The Big 12 South is 8-7 in non-conference play. None of the Big 12 South victories are against teams with winning records. Three of the Big 12 South victories are against Southern Louisiana and two are against Fresno State. The other three opponents that have lost to Big 12 South teams boast a combined 3-10 record.

The downward spiral continues.

Kansas proved to the nation it still doesn't know how to move forward, losing to Cincinnati 34-7. Negative 46 yards rushing. Four fumbles. Two interceptions. Six sacks. Forty-six offensive plays. Fifty-three offensive yards.

Glen Mason, where are you?

And then there's Nebraska. And the week before the Huskers' showdown with Washington, there's Snyder, who has played against Coach Tom Osborne nine times and has lost every single one. Snyder knows in two weeks, the big dogs begin competition against each other.

K-State will visit Lincoln, Neb., and the separation between the big dogs will begin to find who is the biggest dog of the Big 12 Conference.

There he is, warning the critics not to count the Huskers out. There he is, saying the Big 12 isn't as bad as it seems right now. After all, the season's still early.

"When you've been playing Nebraska as long as I have, you realize they can go anyplace and beat anybody anytime," Snyder warned.

And somewhere, there's Washington coach Jim Lambright. It's Tuesday. He's still having the nightmares.

"SOME THINGS YOU JUST CAN'T TEACH."
ERIC HICKSON, RUNNING BACK

Back in the game

▶ RUNNING BACK ERIC HICKSON returns to the field this season after breaking his leg a year ago.

BRANDON WHITE/Collegian

ERIC HICKSON runs through the Ohio line Sept.13 at KSU Stadium. Hickson led the K-State offense with 66 yards rushing.

The Wildcat football team will play its homecoming game Oct. 18 against Texas A&M.

But for at least one Cat, homecoming came more than a month early.

Senior running back Eric Hickson played Sept. 13 against Ohio, carrying the ball 14 times for 66 yards. It was Hickson's first game at KSU Stadium since Nov. 18, 1995. He had been laid up by a broken leg suffered during practice at Fan Appreciation Day in 1996.

He attended the games last year, but he couldn't stay on the sidelines with his teammates because he was wearing a cast. However, on Sept. 13, he strapped on his helmet and shoulder pads and led the Cats in rushing.

"It was really exciting," he said. "I waited all year to get back in here and play in front of the home crowd."

While he waited to put on a show for the fans, he spent a lot of time getting his leg back into shape. Once his leg was fine, he kept working on the rest of his body.

His bench press is up to 388 pounds, and he's playing at 205 pounds this year, 10 pounds heavier than he played in 1995. It's all muscle. He's also just as quick as when he last played, and he's ready to be a leader in the Cats' ground attack again.

"I feel that I'm back to being myself, as far as speed and conditioning. During the spring, I couldn't say that because I wasn't in shape and that was my first time really running," he said.

"I'm kind of glad that coach and my doctor let me go through spring and get all the rust off me and try to get in shape and get some endurance on my leg."

He also said he has the same elusive moves he used in 1995.

"That's all still there," Hickson said. "You never lose that. That's just instinct if you're a running back. Some things you just can't teach. Some things God just gave me."

While Hickson plays out the remaining nine games — 10 if K-State makes it to its fifth-consecutive bowl game — of his senior year, he could be back for a second senior year in 1998.

But it won't be because he's not passing his classes. Hickson graduates in December with a degree in criminology and is thinking about attending graduate school in the spring.

He hopes that next fall, he'll still be in graduate school and playing for the Cats again. Although Hickson is a senior, he could receive a medical redshirt from the NCAA. He didn't play in a single game last year and only put the pads on for a few weeks of practice.

However, he won't find out his fate until the season ends. And until then, he's not going to worry about it.

"I really have left it alone, because I'm not going to worry about that," he said. "I look at this as my senior year, and I'll go on from here. I'm not going to worry about what the NCAA is going to do about my medical redshirt. I'm not going to get into that."

In the meantime, he's going to worry about schoolwork and football. He loves playing football, but he knows his education is important. He said he's always put his time into studying and kept working toward graduation when he broke his leg.

"Some guys put all their eggs in one basket. They go all out on the football field, but they don't do well in the classroom," he said.

"They're just hoping for that big chance to go to the NFL. But for me, I was kind of happy I didn't do that. I had a good upbringing, and my parents were really strict — school, school, school. When I got hurt, I wasn't really worried about it, because I knew I was going to get my degree."

Hickson has taken all his tougher required courses and is finishing up on electives this semester. He said he finally can focus on football and relax a little bit while putting the finishing touches on his degree.

His main worry right now is the team. He said the Cats, including himself, are making too many mistakes — mistakes that will cost the team when Big 12 Conference play rolls around.

Still, the Cats are 2-0, and they know what they have to do to improve, which could be the biggest part of the battle.

"There are no negative thoughts going around in the locker room," he said. "We're a good team. We just know that we have to cut down on our mistakes. If we don't do that, we won't go anywhere."

Going somewhere, either the Big 12 title game or a bowl game, could depend on Hickson's play. A strong running attack will take some pressure off the passing game and balance the offense.

Granted, there are three running backs — Hickson, Mike Lawrence and Marlon Charles — rotating in and out of the lineup, but through the first two games, Hickson leads K-State in rushing with 121 yards and a yards-per-carry average of 4.2.

"I don't have a problem with the rotation. I have confidence in what I can do with the ball and what all the other guys can do with the ball," Hickson said. "Basically, we just get in there and do our jobs, and as long as we win, I'm fine."

And what he's going to do with the ball is go full speed. He's not worried about another injury. He said the injury occurred on a regular play, and it was just a freak accident.

Hickson said he plays just as hard as he ever did and expects to do so on every down the rest of the way.

Attention Cat fans!

The K-State/Nebraska kickoff on Oct. 4th has been rescheduled from 12:30 to 6 p.m., and will be broadcast by Fox Sports Network.

STORY BY SAM FELSENFELD

Volleyball team falls in final non-conference match

SAM FELSENFELD
staff reporter

It finally happened.

The K-State volleyball team showed signs of imperfection last the weekend, losing two of three matches at the Maryland Volleyball Tournament.

After starting the season 7-1 and winning all but one game in their victories, the Wildcats lost to Maryland in four games, came back to beat George Mason 3-0, and lost a five-game match to South Carolina.

"We didn't do anything well today," K-State coach Jim McLaughlin said after the Cats' loss to Maryland. "We had a tough time serving and passing today. We need to be able to take care of things on our own side of the net. When we do that, we're a very good team. We didn't do that today. We had a nice opportunity today, and we didn't capitalize on it."

In the match against Maryland, the defending Atlantic Coast Conference champions, K-State looked like it could be competitive with the No. 23 Terrapins. The Cats lost the first game 7-15, but were answered with a 15-7 win in game two.

However, the Terrapins blanked K-State 15-0 in game three and rolled to the victory with a 15-5 win in game four.

The 15-0 loss in game three was the first time the Cats failed to score a point in a game since game two of a match against Wichita State on Sept. 25, 1990.

"This match was disappointing from start to finish," McLaughlin said. "Maybe we weren't prepared to play. That's my fault."

The loss broke K-State's five-match winning streak and dropped its record to 7-2. Less than three hours later, the Cats had to get on the court again for the match against George Mason.

However, fatigue wasn't a problem for the Cats, although it looked like it was at first.

The Patriots jumped out to a 5-0 lead in game one, but the Cats took advantage of junior right-side hitter Alexis Shepherd's serve to get back into the match. Shepherd recorded consecutive aces to score K-State's first two points, and from there, it played to a 15-13 victory in game one.

In that game, senior setter Devon Ryning had 12 of her career high 23 digs. Ryning also had 13 assists in game one.

K-State played two more close games, winning game two 15-11 and game three 15-10, but still came out of the match with a 3-0 victory, improving its record to 8-2, the fifth-best start in K-State history.

"We started blocking when we had to," McLaughlin said after the match against George Mason. "Our side-out offense was up and down, and I think that was more a result of our passing. We were out of system too much, but we were in system when we had to be at the end of games."

Although the Cats survived playing two matches in four hours, McLaughlin worried about fatigue the night before the match with South Carolina.

"This has been a tough trip for us," he said. "Tomorrow night will be a big challenge. We're tired, and we need to find a way to win tomorrow night's match."

While they might have tried, the Cats came up short in a 3-2 loss to the Gamecocks.

They jumped out to a 2-1 lead, but

REVIEW BY KADY GUYTON

Review Music

First of all, putting nudity on the cover of a demo is the best way to get a reviewer to look at your compact disc twice. But once the cover of Catherine Wheel's newest CD is cracked open, the contents under the bodies are definitely worth hearing.

"Adam and Eve" is a multilayered album that you don't so much listen to as eavesdrop on. Sometimes the music sounds as if it is coming from the other side of the door or as if two people are whispering across the room.

The tracks sort of fall into each other, with one song drifting out and the next fading in before the listener realizes what's going on. According to the band's biography, this was an intentional effect, and it works great. The songs have a melting quality that takes the listener through the whole album seamlessly.

The opening and closing songs are untitled, which also helps give the impression that the listener has stumbled onto a session in progress.

Catherine Wheel covers the gamut of modern musical styles, from hard, thrashing guitars to soft-spoken acoustics, sometimes all in one song.

"Here Comes the Fat Controller" seems to have a definite U2 influence and ends with a door shutting on the music. The closing of the door opens up to "Goodbye," a Pink Floyd-esque tune that gradually builds into a crescendo before sharply dropping off to a few chords being strummed in the distance.

The third track, "Delicious," is an excellent example of the blending Catherine Wheel has perfected on this album. In addition to the layers of sounds there is also a woman's voice that floats through the music like a ghost in the night. Just when you think you might be able to hear what she is saying, she floats away. But a second later she's whispering in your ear.

Throughout this album, however, there are lots of audio treats to be picked up on: very subtle violins that seem to be going their own way and faint vocals that take one ear on its own journey while leaving the other to mind the rest of the album.

I recommend listening to this with headphones the first time to fully appreciate the dimensions of sound layered here.

The whole album is a moody multidimensional trip that can be enjoyed by anyone who likes modern rock music.

Catherine Wheel is a four-member British band that hasn't been heard from around here since 1995. I hope this latest offering will change that.

'A Chorus Line' gala tonight

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

Friends of McCain is starting off on the right foot as "A Chorus Line" dances its way into Manhattan this evening.

The group is sponsoring a gala before the 8 p.m. performance to raise the profile of McCain Auditorium, Friends of McCain and "A Chorus Line," Richard Martin, director of McCain, said. This is the first performance this fall.

He said if McCain increases its visibility in the community, then more interest in future performances can be raised.

The gala will be from 5:30 to 7:30 tonight at the Ramada Inn. Tickets for the event are $50 and can be purchased at the McCain Box Office. Half of the ticket price is a contribution to McCain, and the other half pays for the buffet and cocktails provided at the gala. For entertainment, The Willies will provide music.

"It's open to anyone who wishes to come," said Debbie Haun, Friends of McCain member and gala coordinator.

The gala ticket does not include a ticket for the performance. Although the event is nearly sold out, there are some seats left in the upper balcony. Student tickets are $13, and tickets for the general public are $26.

Haun said 135 people are planning to attend the event. This figure includes regular sponsors and other individuals interested in contributing to the "A Chorus Line" performance.

Haun said she was pleased with the number of individuals attending the gala despite the performance being on a weeknight.

Some of the sponsors of "A Chorus Line" are carried over from the canceled performance of "Singin' in the Rain" last fall. Martin said that sponsors of the canceled performance could choose from returning their contributions, applying them to the "A Chorus Line" events or directing them to another activity.

To purchase tickets for "A Chorus Line" or the gala, contact the McCain Box Office at 532-6428.

Architect Walker draws inspiration from collective works of many artists

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

There is a fine line between art and the landscape architecture of Peter Walker.

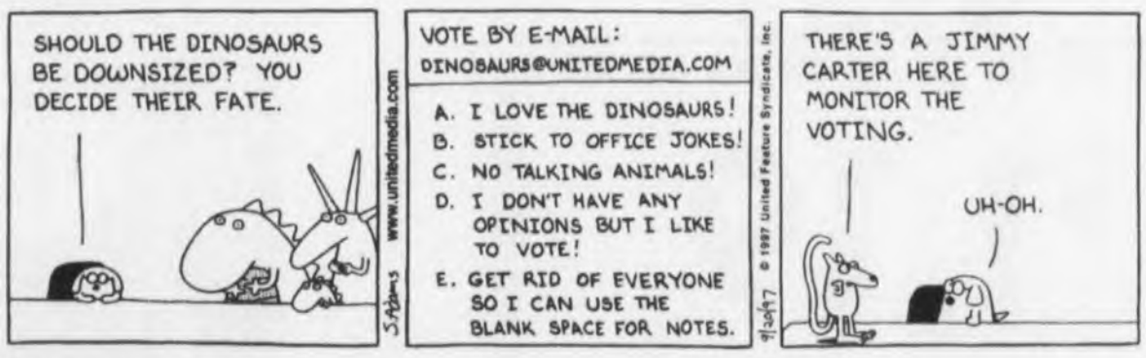
Walker, who presented the Oscar Ekdahl Memorial Lecture on Monday afternoon in Forum Hall, draws his inspiration from the work of artists. The lecture is administered by the College of Architecture, Planning and Design.

It is no coincidence that Walker and Los Angeles architect Frank Gehry, who admits he looks to artists for inspiration, were students together at Harvard University's Graduate School of Design.

The works of both Walker and Gehry illustrate the old tradition of interplay between the arts, letting one inform the other and vice versa. Walker's works combine landscape elements from the minimalist work of Frank Stella and the simple environmental art of James Smithson.

Walker founded his first firm, Sasaki, Walker and Associates, in 1957. Beginning with mainly modernist designs, the firm's work slowly progressed to village design and pictorial landscapes.

"I think I was, at that point, very far from where I started — beginning as a modernist and then a minimalist," Walker said.



He left Sasaki and became a professor at Harvard. In 1975 he established The SWA Group, later forming Peter Walker and Partners in 1983.

The work that follows his creative revelation in the early 1970s is sensitive to artistic solutions, collaboration with architects and creating landscapes that invent their own space.

When it came to a rooftop for a parking garage, instead of boxes of plants, Walker injected a rigid Stella-like maze of gravels dotted with white, geometric trees reminiscent of a Sol LeWitt sculpture. The complexity of the trees causes them to change with the angle at which one views them.

Facility modernization requires organized planning, expansion

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

As K-State campus facilities are modernized and expanded, so too must the development process that begins with planning and ends with construction.

K-State's campus planning is a complex process that depends on many factors. It begins simply with talk of building. A site is eventually chosen. Needs are assessed. In time, private or public money is pursued, then attained, and construction begins.

Most of this process occurs inside the bureaucracy of the administration — namely the department of facilities planning, the vice president of administration and finance's office and the academic bodies or departments involved with the development.

There is also a network of campus committees responsible for advising campus development; not to mention the need for the Kansas Board of Regents and legislative authority.

Since fall 1996, Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, and Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and university architect, have discussed making some changes in the process.

Those changes would be bringing more campus groups, including more students, into the overall planning process on a consistent basis.

Rawson said plans for the new process include gathering information every September from the academic deans, which would bring to light their developmental goals over the next five or 10 years.

"We would then have an open forum in early December with the Faculty Senate, the Landscape Advisory Committee, Student Senate and the University Development Committee to brief everyone," Rawson said. "We'll seek input after that meeting during all of January and February."

Rawson said there would be a follow-up meeting every March to have further discussion.

The administration is drawing up a flow chart outlining the process that will be presented for discussion at the September meeting of the academic deans.

President Jon Wefald said there needs to be a spotlight put on campus development.

"We take for granted everyone knows what's going on," Wefald said. "We're here year after year, but every year you have a new Student Senate."

The 1997-98 school year is one of the busiest years for campus development for facilities planning.

Carter said the university has more engineers and architects working for campus projects than there have ever been in the history of the campus.

To understand this year's development, one needs to look no further than last year's planning.

Last year, facilities planning began comprehensive discussions with every dean and department head on campus to inform them of where the university will spend the Crumbling Classrooms money it received from the state legislature. Many faculty and staff members of the University Development Committee were actively involved in those meetings.

Carter said the meetings were so well-received last year, facilities wanted to expand the process this year.

"From a planning standpoint, we needed to spend last year concentrating on how we were going to get the money we got from the legislature spent on the projects we wanted to do and let the campus community know what we're doing," Carter said. "We spent a lot of time, and I think it really was well-received."

The need for the meetings is a complicated issue.

The university is required to submit five- and 10-year plans to the regents in July. This is done so the regents can prepare documents and receive approval in order to ask for legislative funds, if public money is needed.

"We were still ending up having a lot of projects suddenly popping up in mid-stride that needed to be in a five-year or 10-year plan or to have legislative authority," Carter said. "We were trying to figure out how we could reign in all of these little projects and get them more defined."

Carter said it doesn't matter how big or small a project is. It still needs legislative authority approval.

"When we meet with the deans, we want to verify what projects they know about," Carter said. "Are they anticipating any projects that require legislative approval at the next session? Are there projects that could wait for the next cycle of the five-year or 10-year plan?"

The process is ongoing and intricate.

All projects that will be considered in the legislature's 1998 session, which begins in January, have already been submitted to the regents. Some final projects could be submitted as late as November and still have time for approval.

Carter said the process of meetings and forums is already beginning for building projects going before the 1999 legislature, since the university's documentation should be to the regents by April 1, 1998.

The planned open forums will bring a wider campus community into the process.

Carter said that the open forums, similar to the Crumbling Classroom program, are to inform people of upcoming and current campus development and to get feedback.

Carter said he is also looking at expanded roles for the Parking Council, the committee that deals with implementation of the Americans with Disabilities Act and the Campus Development Committee. He said he is also forming a university committee to address historic preservation on campus for state historic sites, which include Anderson Hall and two radio towers near Calvin Hall.

KEVIN OLSON, of KSU Facilities, vaccums the main lobby of Anderson Hall Monday afternoon.

K-State police to maintain alcohol policy at home games

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

K-State Police will look for blatant violations of the no-alcohol-on-state-property law at home football games, said Ronnie Grice, director of the department, at the Interfraternity Council meeting Monday.

However, Grice said with a fairly small police force, officers wouldn't be able to check every cup for alcohol. Kegs of beer police find will be confiscated, he said, but if people are caught at the gate with a keg they can turn back.

He said minors in possession of alcohol can expect a strict enforcement of the law at games.

With an expected average attendance of 42,000 at K-State's home games, Grice said he was concerned about safety.

Problems at past games were not limited to either college students or older fans, he said.

Last year, a young girl was nearly struck by a car driven by an intoxicated young man. In another parking lot, a fight had to be broken up between older fans, Grice said.

"I only know one way to enforce the law — that's equally," he said.

> "I want you to have a good time, but I also want your to be responsible."
>
> • Ronnie Grice
> K-State Police director

Grice also said he would like to see IFC help keep fraternity houses safe.

"I want you to have a good time, but I also want you to be responsible," he said.

He asked IFC members to look out for their fraternity brothers and to be reasonable and responsible.

IFC invited Grice to speak as a follow-up to a meeting earlier in the semester.

The presentation was part of IFC's aim to make fraternity houses safer.

At the meeting, fraternity presidents, the Riley County Police Department, campus police and community representatives discussed concerns about how the fraternities were perceived.

Greg Davis, IFC president, said the university and fraternities might have gained a poor image in the past. But he said fraternities are trying to cooperate to change that.

CONCERNS

Scott Ladd, editor in chief of the Collegian, said he is concerned because Student Publications will have two fees reviewed this year.

"As a student, I am scared," Ladd said.

The general Student Publications fee will be reviewed in the spring. The equipment fee budget will be reviewed this fall because of confusion during the summer.

Patrick Carney, Governmental Relations Committee chair and last year's chairman of the Board of Student Publications, said when the bill was originally introduced to Senate, a portion of the loan was to be reviewed after four years.

A week later, a different version of the bill was voted on and passed.

However, the length of the loan was not included, Carney said. Student Publications was funded for two years instead of four because the language of the bill did not specifically mention the four-year period.

Carney said Student Publications didn't want or ask for a time limit, but the Privilege Fee Committee proposed two, three and four years as a way to lessen the increase of student fees.

Student Publications agreed to a four-year agreement with the committee, Carney said.

"Part of the confusion is this perception that Student Publications came to Privilege Fee with a four-year proposal. That is inaccurate," he said.

"Student Publications came up with a list of equipment, which gave subtotals and totals. Privilege Fee put a time limit on it," Carney, said.

Bret Glendening, committee member, said there was no way to go back and fix what was already done.

"Rather than dwell on the past, we need to move ahead," Glendening said. "We should try to see what we need to pick up for the final two years."

The committee asked Johnson what could be done to remedy the situation.

"I'd like the remainder of the two years to be funded like it was originally intended," Johnson said.

Johnson said students and the staff at Student Publications are frustrated because they have spent hundreds of hours preparing what the committee has asked for.

"I want some insurance that the next time we invest, it won't be wasted like it was this summer," Johnson said.

Johnson said he was curious why Student Publications had to defend its fee again.

"Essentially, we have to justify everything again?" Johnson asked.

Truax said the committee needs clarification of where Student Publications is, and where it intends to be.

"If you want more money, then you'll have to justify it," Truax said.

Johnson said money was not the issue.

"We aren't asking for more money," he said.

Carney said Student Publications wanted the equipment allocated to it by its agreement with Senate.

"In the end, we're just interested in the equipment," he said.

President ready to send nuclear test ban to Senate

ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — After a yearlong wait, President Clinton announced Monday he will ask the Senate to approve a treaty to ban all nuclear test explosions.

In a speech to the United Nations' 52nd General Assembly, the president called for creation of an international court to prosecute crimes against humanity.

Clinton

It was one year ago that Clinton became the first world leader to sign the historic Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty. He had delayed sending it to the Senate while trying to build support for the measure. By forwarding the treaty now, Clinton might open a battle with Republicans, many of whom say some testing is needed to maintain nuclear stockpiles.

Clinton called the test ban treaty "our commitment to end all nuclear tests for all time, the longest-sought, hardest-fought prize in the history of arms control. It will help to prevent the nuclear powers from developing more advanced and more dangerous weapons. It will limit the possibilities for other states to acquire such devices.

"I am pleased to announce that today I am sending this crucial treaty to the United States Senate for ratification," Clinton said. He urged that all nations put the treaty into effect as soon as possible.

The president also backed revamping the U.N. Security Council. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright expressed support for giving permanent seats to Germany and Japan and adding three others for Latin America, Africa and Asia, with countries in those regions rotating as the council expands to 20 or 21.

CHECKS

fee. There are always other ways to get cash with ATMs around."

Haggart said they hope students will use their services, and the bank is dedicated to providing services at this campus branch.

The figures presented by Commerce were based on cashing 200 checks per day with a yearly expense of $19,500. The check cashing and return-check fees will help pay for the expense.

"If we're going to have a decent bank in the Union, we're going to have to pay for it," said Matt Jones, student representative and senior in business management.

"As a student, 75 cents will make me think twice about cashing a check," Tien said. She said she agrees with the need for a fee to counterbalance the expenses incurred, but said the bank shouldn't be given a chance to profit from the students.

"This is one condition the bank knew would be an issue in the beginning," Pitts said.

Many students who want to avoid the fee will simply open an account with Commerce, said Mike Hodgson, UGB secretary and junior in pre-law and English.

Assistant Director of Business Affairs Jack Thoman said another issue would be the option for students to cash checks at the information counter when the bank is closed. A motion was passed 7-0, approving the new fee imposed on checks cashed at the counter. This fee will be a charge of 25 cents for each check cashed.

"You're basically getting less bang for your buck," Tien said. "You can only cash a check for $20 at the counter, and I feel it should be less because you get less money."

Thoman said check cashing has declined and ATM use has increased.

"Commerce Bank is here for Commerce Bank," said Patrick Carney, president of UGB and senior in political science and history. "It's a business within a business. When they prosper, we prosper and they are accepting expenses that we would normally have."

In other business, UGB members approved a proposal to send out an application to review costs and options available for officers' and director's insurance.

Terri Eddy, Union Recreation Center manager, spoke to board members about recreation options available on the ground floor of the Union.

This will become a new agenda item allowing all departments to come in and talk about their areas, Pitts said.

LECTURE

"All through my career, I've been interested in how you can look at one thing and see it several ways," Walker said.

Further mirroring Stella's rigid, linear work where the lines of paint bleed together to form subtly darker lines between them, Walker placed plantings in alternating rows. This allowed them to grow or bleed toward the center. This might be the closest that landscape gets to canvas.

Walker's stated goal is to accomplish as much with a landscape with as little as possible — still a die-hard minimalist.

He worked with Gehry on the landscape for the architect's distribution center for Herman Miller in Rockland, Calif. The building represents Gehry's iconographic stage, where his buildings are more a series of interrelated sections.

"It's very hard to find analogs to the moves he's making," Walker said.

To mimic the tight, tense forms of the building, Walker placed large boulders along the outlaying pedestrian walks, essentially bordering a large prairie. It's a simple but effective move.

Walker might be Gehry's landscape counterpart, a modernist who slowly worked himself into a classically derived formal corner that eventually exploded. And those fragments have grown into magnificent landscapes.

couldn't finish off South Carolina. K-State came close to closing out the match in game four, but lost 15-13. In game five, the Gamecocks won 15-11 to improve to 8-2 on the season. K-State fell to 8-3.

Ryning led the Cats with 55 assists, and junior swing hitter Kim Zschau led K-State with 19 kills.

K-State opens up Big 12 Conference play Friday at home against No. 20 Colorado and will play at home again on Saturday against Nebraska. The Cats have never beaten Nebraska, losing all 55 matches they have played against the Cornhuskers.

Despite starting conference play this weekend, the Cats added a non-conference match to their schedule next week.

K-State will play an exhibition match against the USA Women's National Volleyball Team Monday at Ahearn Field House.

"This is a special opportunity for our women to be exposed to and play against the national team. At some point in time we'd like to have some women from K-State put on a USA jersey and represent our country," McLaughlin said.

"I think what's exciting about this match is that it's the highest level of volleyball in our country. Manhattan will be exposed to our best athletes playing at the highest level in the world."

Forum provides privilege fee chat

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

An expanded stadium and a move of K-State health services to Mercy Health Center on Sunset Avenue came up during a Union forum as future projects for university organizations.

The projects were brought by Athletic Director Max Urick and Lafene Health Center Director Lannie Zweimiller, respectively. Both said they were uncomfortable with giving specifics about the plans, only that both were being considered.

Attendance was sparse at the forum Tuesday afternoon in the Union courtyard. Aaron Otto, Privilege Fee Committee chair, was the host.

Otto, who was part of Student Senate when the Privilege Fee Committee was formed four years ago, said this is the first forum the group has sponsored. He said that partly explained why less than 15 people stayed for the entire forum.

"We've always listened to what people have to say, but we've never gone out to get their opinions," Otto said.

From 4:45 to 6:15 p.m. Thursday, committee members will tour Derby, Van Zile and Kramer food centers. Anyone will be able to ask questions about privilege fees, Otto said.

Representatives were present from the five K-State organizations whose privilege fee allocations for the 1999 fiscal year are under review by the committee. They described what their organizations plan to do this year with their share of the $251 charged to each full-time K-State student, a sum of more than $8 million.

New students pay for Wildcat Cards

▲ The Wildcat Card. Students who received bills recently from the Controller's Office questioned a $15 fee assessed for the new ID card. Only new and transfer students were assessed the fee.

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

Students who waited until August to pose for their photo IDs might have been surprised by a bill from the Controller's Office this month.

The $15 Wildcat Card fee for new and transfer students, however, is nothing new.

Jack Thoman, assistant director of the K-State Student Union, said all new and transfer students were charged a $15 one-time fee this year to set up their Wildcat Cards.

"There was a decision made months ago with the administration that when we implemented this whole card program, there would be a $15 fee for new students and transfers," Thoman said.

Students who posed for their card during pre-enrollment were charged for the Wildcat Card when they received their tuition bills. Others who waited until August to stand in ID card lines were billed for their cards this month, Thoman said.

Students who recently received a bill for the Wildcat Card have questioned the charge, but Thoman said every new and transfer student was charged for the ID. The $15 fee might have been overlooked by many students when it appeared on their statement with tuition and other charges, he said.

Returning students who lost their old student IDs were also charged $15 for a new card. Thoman said the new card fee won't change, and students who lose their Wildcat Cards will be charged another $15 to get a new one.

"These new cards were a major investment," Thoman said. "There are more values and privileges with this card, and the $15 fee emphasizes the value of holding onto it."

Trendy bottled water not necessarily healthier

ASHLEY YOULE
staff reporter

Naya, Evian, Aquafina, Wet Willie. Healthier than Manhattan tap water? No. Becoming a 1990s trend? Definitely.

▲ Bottled water. Cool-looking bottles don't always equal high health standards. Unlike tap water, bottled water doesn't have chlorine to fight off bacteria.

If you haven't noticed, bottled water has become a popular companion to movie stars, models, athletes and college students.

Why all the hype? George Marchin, K-State water expert, said it's not the nutritional value. Bottled water just looks cool.

"It's a fashionable thing," he said. "It's convenient because people are more health conscious and they're drinking less soda."

It might be more fun to drink out of bottles, but that's not the healthiest alternative, Marchin said.

Bottled water is less closely regulated than tap water. Typical bottled water starts with the city water, and the city runs it through machines to remove solids and ions, he said. Many companies use additional procedures, but important minerals are lost in these processes.

"If the bottled water is distilled, it has no minerals," Gary Kincy, Manhattan water plant supervisor, said. "Doctors will tell you, mineralized water is better."

Many students on campus take bottled water to class or to study. Once they finish what's in the bottle, a lot of them refill it with water from local drinking fountains or from faucets at home, Kincy said. This is where the problem occurs.

"Once you take a drink, bacteria from your mouth is on the bottle. If you refill the bottle or put it back in the refrigerator, the bacteria spreads," he said.

What's missing in these popular bottled waters is the chlorine. Chlorine is what kills bacteria in the water, and without it, bacteria will grow, Kincy said.

Take a look at a bottle of Evian. In small print on the side of the bottle it reads, "Do not refill." It's important to realize what minerals you aren't getting and what bacteria you are exposing yourself to in bottled water, Kincy said.

Sometimes there is a difference in taste. In bottled water such as Wet Willie, minerals have been added to improve taste. High levels of sulfite are what gives water such a bad taste, Marchin said. Calcium improves taste and can be found in harder water.

"Water is water to me," Adrienne Kratzberg, junior in accounting, said. "I think they all taste the same, but where I'm from, the water tastes disgusting."

Kincy said water tastes different in other places because

Silver Key camp-out to benefit homeless shelter

DAVID LOTT
staff writer

Members of Silver Key sophomore honorary camped out and shot hoops Tuesday to benefit the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

The K-State women's basketball team and Silver Key members held a fund-raiser in the free-speech zone Tuesday.

People could donate $1 to play a member of the basketball team in a game of PIG.

Anyone who beat a basketball player had their name put in a drawing for a court-side seat at K-State's season-opening game, said Bill Harlan, sophomore in agricultural education and agricultural economics.

All proceeds from playing basketball will be donated to the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, Harlan said.

Ideas and input from previous Silver Key members helped the current members plan the event, he said.

Stephanie Symes, sophomore in marketing and Silver Key member, said the addition of the women's basketball team was an asset to the project.

"It gets them more publicity," she said.

Silver Key members camped out at the free-speech zone from 7 p.m. Tuesday to 7 p.m. Wednesday. Manhattan Mayor Bruce Snead spoke at 8 p.m., followed by Junell Norris, executive of the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

"Getting the women's basketball team involved is excellent," Norris said.

Silver Key started the camp-out fund-raiser three years ago.

"It's always been a very successful fund-raiser," Norris said.

Proceeds from the event come in at a dead time of the year for funding the shelter.

Grants are ending at the end of September. New grant money will come in October.

Giving exposure to the homeless in Manhattan helps people realize there is a problem in Manhattan, Norris said. Four hundred to 500 individuals use the shelter every year, she said.

The shelter helps empower individuals to become self-sufficient and regain and maintain independence, Norris said.

She said that is one of the reasons people don't see the homeless in Manhattan, making fund raising difficult.

"It's not something you see here," Norris said.

Soldiers volunteer to be mentors for at-risk students

SHEYENE FOSTER
staff writer

Ruth Greiner and her fifth-grade partner were matched at random, but they became good friends. Ruth helped her with her homework, they took long walks, and they stayed in contact even after the school year ended. And it was all because of the U.S. Army.

Last spring, Fort Riley, in conjunction with Geary County USD 475, started a mentoring program known as KIDS 2000. The program was designed to meet the needs of the school district and help at-risk children in USD 475.

There are three aspects of the KIDS 2000 program: mentoring, unit affiliation and parental development.

Mentoring pairs an at-risk child in USD 475 with a soldier who has a skill to share. After screening and training of the mentor, the Army allows one hour per week for the soldiers to work with their students. The mentors meet the students at their schools and can provide one-on-one tutoring, as well as other academic assistance. They can also simply be friends.

Soldiers and Army officers, Army civilians and sometimes family members of soldiers can volunteer. As of now, more than 300 soldiers have volunteered, as well as some civilians.

Greiner, a test control officer at the Fort Riley Education Center, said she was satisfied with the program last year and would continue to volunteer.

"I really enjoyed it," Greiner said. "I think she did, too. We became good friends and have talked since then. I learned a lot from her, and I think she learned a lot from me, too."

Unit affiliation links every Army unit to one of 17 schools in the district. The unit can then assist in organizing events in the school, such as carnivals and tours of Fort Riley.

The parental involvement portion of KIDS 2000 allows soldiers to take time off to attend their children's parent-teacher conferences.

Gordon Farmer, director of education at Fort Riley, said the program is good for the soldiers and gives them an opportunity to feel like part of the community.

"We think that this is a good program because one of the things the Army has been involved in is volunteerism," Farmer said. "KIDS 2000 has brought this concept to lower- and mid-level soldiers and gets them involved with their community."

Additionally, Farmer said the mentoring program has had positive effects already.

"USD 475 says they've seen many benefits," Farmer said. "Primarily, it allows one-on-one interaction for at-risk students and takes a lot of the work load off the teacher. This allows the teacher to do other things while still meeting the needs of the students."

Charles Bolland, communications coordinator for USD 475, agreed the program has been beneficial. He said he foresees even more benefits from KIDS 2000 in the future.

"It was well into the school year last year before the program actually got rolling," Bolland said. "This year, we're off and running with a good start and many volunteers in Fort Riley. Teachers and administrators are very excited about this program."

Man, woman killed on campus of University of Michigan

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — A man who was stabbing his student girlfriend on the University of Michigan campus Tuesday was shot by a school police officer. Both the man and his girlfriend died in surgery, authorities said.

The officer, responding to 911 calls, drove into a campus parking lot shortly after midnight and fired when the man refused to obey his order to stop his attack on the woman, Leo Heatley, campus public safety, said.

The woman was identified as Tamara Williams, a 20-year-old senior. Her killer was identified as Kevin Nelson, 26, who lived with Williams but was not affiliated with the university.

Williams' 2-1/2-year-old daughter was asleep in the apartment and was placed in protective custody, Heatley said. He did not give her name.

Williams and Nelson both died in surgery at the University of Michigan Medical Center.

Campus police received several calls of the attack in progress at 12:17 a.m., Heatley said.

Boy sentenced to state custody for 8 arson deaths in Oregon

HILLSBORO, Ore. — A mentally disabled 12-year-old boy was sentenced Tuesday to 13 years of state custody for setting a fire that killed eight people.

Ray DeFord, who has a mental age of 7, was found responsible — the juvenile court equivalent of guilty — last month for setting the fire that killed five children and three adults in his apartment complex in Aloha, a suburb west of Portland.

"I'm still convinced he has no idea what he did," Circuit Judge Timothy Alexander said at Tuesday's sentencing. "That's precisely what makes Ray so dangerous."

Defense lawyers argued that Ray couldn't understand the consequences of his actions because of brain damage caused at least in part by beatings from his father.

The boy initially was hailed as a hero for alerting neighbors to the fire. He said he had been awakened by the squeals of his pet rats, but he finally admitted that he squirted rubbing alcohol on a stack of newspapers and lit it.

He was unable to get a fire extinguisher to work and then poured flour on the flames, he told detectives. He knew water would help but didn't want to risk his father's wrath by turning on a faucet.

3 fast-food restaurants retain exclusive rights to NCAA logo

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — KFC, Pizza Hut and Taco Bell will become the exclusive fast-food restaurants of the National Collegiate Athletic Association under a deal worked out by their parent company.

Tricon Global Restaurants Inc. said the multiyear deal will enable the three to use the NCAA logo in their advertising and packaging.

Sales of commercials on telecasts of NCAA events are not part of the agreement.

The fast-food chains have long been part of the same corporation under PepsiCo, but their marketing efforts have remained distinct. In the past, only Pizza Hut has had a sponsorship deal with the NCAA.

With Tricon set to spin off from PepsiCo and become a separate entity Oct. 6, the new agreement offered the company an opportunity to unite the brands in an initial marketing strategy.

Wichita attorney files 2 lawsuits for women who used diet drugs

WICHITA — Two Kansas women have filed lawsuits over injuries they say were caused by a prescription diet drug recently pulled from the market because of links to heart problems.

Also, the state is part of a national class-action lawsuit seeking medical monitoring for former users of the drugs fenfluramine and dexfenfluramine.

Both were taken off the market a week ago.

Andrew Hutton, a Wichita attorney, filed personal injury lawsuits Friday on behalf of Oma Detwiller and Vicki Sanchez, both of Wichita.

Hutton said Sanchez, 32, has evidence of pulmonary hypertension, while Detwiller sustained damage to her heart valve.

The women are each seeking damages in excess of $75,000. The actual amount has not been determined, because the women are still trying to access the extent of their health problems, Hutton said.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration has urged millions of dieters to immediately stop taking

Festival's apple pie recipe yields friendships

REVA ROBINSON, left, and Cindy Foster, both of Fort Riley, put the finishing touches on apple pies in the Custer House on Fort Riley. They made 800 pies Tuesday morning.

CLIF PALMBERG
Collegian

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

With 7,000 apples, 200 pounds of flour, 368 pounds of sugar and 146 pounds of margarine, volunteers set out to bake more than 800 pies for the annual Apple Days Festival.

Perfect strangers can sit down next to each other next to a bowl of apples and walk away as friends, Karen Kryschtal, adviser to the Fort Riley Historical and Archaeological Society, said.

"It's an amazing process, and it all finally comes together," Kryschtal said.

Apple Days is sponsored by the historical society. The festival is from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday. All events will take place on Cavalry Parade Field in Fort Riley.

Lori Norton of Fort Riley said this is her first year helping with the pie efforts at the Custer House.

"We were stationed here in 1992, and people made the pies in their homes and brought them the morning of the festival," Norton said. "They donated any apple dessert, and it was sold at the festival by the slice or whole."

More than 200 volunteers worked four shifts on Monday and Tuesday to make the pies, and others will bake them in their homes on Friday.

"We like the sense of community that it brings, doing it as a group," Kryschtal said.

Frozen or baked pies are available whole for $7. Orders were taken in advance from the historical society, and pies can be bought the day of the event. Slices of pie will be selling for $1 or $1.50 for pie a la mode on Saturday.

Last year, the pies raised an excess of $5,000, and all proceeds go back to the post. Some of the money is used for upkeep of the Custer House, and another part has gone to purchase plaques for old limestone monuments. Kryschtal said the society wants to maintain the integrity of the monuments, so the plaques will bear the original inscriptions.

"It's a good community project to provide money for the historical society," said Suzann Mayfield, second-year volunteer from Fort Riley. "We do it because it's fun, and it is a good way to build lasting friendships."

Apple Days features a variety of re-enactments, including groups of volunteers dressed as Civil War soldiers and the Old Cow Town Re-enactor Society. Also, Dave Zerfas will be on hand to perform his unusual brand of ballads. The family of Scott Price will re-create the daily living of the 1880s by dressing in costume and telling stories.

Free cider will be given away during demonstrations of an old-fashioned cider press. Other demonstrations include the color guard and a static display of vintage military vehicles and weapons from World War I.

Concessions will be available through volunteering efforts of 10 family support groups. All proceeds will go to help the individual groups to support families within their units.

The Ways and Means Committee from the historical society will have books and other items of Fort Riley history for sale during the event. "Custer's Last Quilt" will be worked on throughout the day by volunteers, and people will be allowed to purchase opportunities to own the quilt.

To highlight the events throughout the day, an announcer will be telling participants what the activities are so that no one misses anything, Kryschtal said.

"This is a big effort, and people not only come to see it, but people volunteer from all parts," said Nancy Schirner, coordinator of the festival and vice president of the historical society.

Two Spring 1997 graduates from the College of Architecture, Planning and Design received two of the four fellowships offered in a national competition.

"To win half of the available awards in the premier national architecture competition speaks very well of our College of Architecture, Planning and Design," President Jon Wefald said. "Once again, K-State College of Architecture students have shown that they are some of the best and brightest students from anywhere in the United States."

This is the third consecutive year and the fifth time since 1991 that a K-State graduate has been awarded a $10,000 Skidmore, Owings & Merrill Foundation Traveling Fellowship in architecture.

Since 1981, when the fellowships were founded, graduates from only 13 American schools have been honored.

The fellowship requires extended international travel and study abroad within 18 months after a recipient accepts the award. Recipients must prepare a final report after they travel.

Matt Pinkstaff, Spring 1997 graduate, is the fifth student from K-State to win the award. He plans to use the award to conduct research on housing in Europe.

"I really look at this as a blessing," Pinkstaff said. "It's not about the money. It's about an opportunity to keep learning."

Susanne Siepl-Coates, associate professor of architecture, said she knew Pinkstaff was gifted as a second-year student when she was his adviser.

"Matt was clearly one of our best students," Siepl-Coates said. "I was pleased to see him go on and win this award."

This year, Skidmore, Owings & Merrill also offered a prize in interior architecture. Tanya Wuertz, Spring 1997 graduate, is the first person to win this national award. She plans to use the $7,500 fellowship to travel to Tel Aviv, Israel, and Berlin for a comparative study of urban centers in those cities.

Wuertz attributed her success to the help of College of Architecture, Planning and Design faculty and other K-State staff.

"They worked with me so much," she said. "They helped me develop my study and conducted a mock interview. I was very well prepared."

For the architecture award, each school is permitted to nominate two candidates whose application materials are examined anonymously by a jury of internationally renowned architects and critics.

The two best portfolios are then matched to the candidates, and they are invited for an interview. The fellowship is then awarded to the best candidate.

Siepl-Coates said K-State students are well prepared for the competition. The architecture faculty nominates two students by looking at overall performance in architecture design studio.

The students put together a portfolio of their best work to submit. The students also do a mock interview with faculty and various advisers in other colleges, she said.

"This is an incredibly prestigious competition. Our students are competing against the very best from top universities such as MIT and Columbia," said Dennis Law, dean of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design.

"And to top it off, the most competition is in the undergraduate area," Law said. "So we are especially delighted to have two winners. This is a big deal."

Fans can run to Ahearn after football for more Wildcat action

Like any other football weekend, Manhattan will be painted purple for the game against Bowling Green this weekend.

Overshadowed by the football game, the volleyball team has its most crucial weekend of the season, and few people have noticed yet.

The team is coming off its first NCAA Tournament appearance, and with the help of new coach Jim McLaughlin, hopes to improve on its fourth-place conference finish a year ago.

This crucial weekend is timed perfectly for the K-State volleyball team. It plays Colorado at 7 p.m. Friday at Ahearn Field House and Nebraska at 7 p.m. Saturday.

Both teams are nationally ranked, with the Buffaloes 24th and the Cornhuskers fifth. Winning these two matches would position the Wildcats well for the rest of the Big 12 season.

The team needs our support. K-State has only beaten Colorado five times in 21 meetings, but has won two of the past four. There has been an even more overwhelming lack of success against Nebraska, the 1995 national champions. K-State has never beaten the Cornhuskers in 55 meetings.

Never.

This can change. The team has proven its strength this year and can likely beat anybody at any time. Crowd support is very important to the volleyball team, and a good crowd, like in any other sport, can be the difference between a victory and a defeat. Ahearn is a great atmosphere, especially with a large crowd.

Because so many people will be in town to cheer on the football team this weekend, that support needs to be extended to the volleyball team.

A large crowd Friday would help the team triumph over the Buffaloes. Nebraska traditionally brings in more than 1,000 fans for its matches. We need to drown out the Huskers' cheers with our own and overwhelm the red with a loud sea of purple.

After the football game, run for Ahearn. This is a great opportunity to show your K-State pride and catch some great volleyball action in the process.

Bow, wow wow

In this day and age of cynics and rebuffed optimists, living the life of a dog seems to be more profitable.

Recently, I have been having some less-than-philosophical thoughts about life. In fact, some of them are simply insane. There is one in particular I would like to share.

Have you ever wished you were a dog?

I know it sounds crazy, but think about it. Get with the right people, and you have yourself quite a deal. Free room and board. Love and affection. Sometimes you even get a treat if you manage to poop in the right place.

What a deal.

And, most important of all, you would only have to stick around this goofy world for about 10 or 15 years, and then you could leave.

Maybe I am missing something here. Maybe I just don't understand the meaning or the purpose for this life.

Maybe I just miss Dad.

I know and understand that good people (like my father, Mother Teresa, the Princess of Wales and many others) die every day.

I do not understand why.

In reading popular literature and listening to the lyrics of the songwriters of today, it would appear I am not alone.

Cynicism abounds, and optimism is most often thought foolish.

Even in reading the Bible, one can find a book of one man's endless searchings for true happiness in life. It seems the book of Ecclesiastes is to the culture of that time what the Vietnam War-era protest songs were to 1960s mainstream culture — a reaction against it.

"Meaningless! Meaningless!" says the teacher. "All is meaningless."

Thus begins the book of Ecclesiastes, written by Solomon whom God had blessed with more riches and wisdom than most of us could even imagine.

KEVIN BAILEY is a senior in elementary education. You can send your e-mail comments to Kevin at (kevinsb@ksu.edu).

So we see that the cynicism found in today's culture is not a new phenomenon. The basic difference between the cynicism of today and the cynicism of the past is this: In the past, cynics have seen a problem, thought about it, agonized over it and — most important of all — done something about it.

It seems that today's cynics have fallen in a trap. We have fallen in a trap of inaction. We write our columns, sing our songs and give our speeches. People still starve, the homeless stay that way, and people die without ever hearing about the Jesus I believe in.

We write, sing and talk.

Writing, singing and speech-making are not bad things. I enjoy all three very much. However, when we do only those things, we do an injustice to those who have come before us.

Martin Luther King Jr., Medgar Evers, those brave ones who stood up to Hitler in Nazi Germany, Gandhi, the martyrs of Christendom — the list could go on.

These were people who looked at a bad situation and were determined to make it better, no matter the cost. And it often cost them their lives.

Very few of us who write the columns, sing the songs and make the speeches would be willing to make the sacrifices it takes to accomplish change. It's much easier to be cynical to no good end than to be a catalyst for change.

What good are our beliefs and convictions if we do nothing about them?

We might call war evil. That is our right. But what have we accomplished unless we are willing to offer solutions to the problem?

We weep for the starving people in lands far away. But, if that is all we do, what have we truly done?

We might decry organized religion as nothing more than a paper-thin front for the greedy. But it is for naught if we are not willing to seek the truth behind man's endless search for God.

The soundest doctrine, the firmest convictions, the truest beliefs — all are meaningless if we do nothing to give validity to what we say we believe in.

I believe the way to fight the rising tide of greedy, self-centered behavior is not with our words, but with our actions. We should not simply tell people how it isn't, nor just let them know what should be.

Rather, we should show them with our actions — with our lives — what we have failed to convey with our speeches, songs and columns.

For some, such as I, who become so discouraged with the world as to want to leave it behind — a dog's life might be preferable.

But, alas, for all the benefits of a short, well-taken-care-of life, we would lose the ability to be cynical. And that would be a tragedy that none could bear.

So, I would say to my fellow cynics: Write, sing and speak — but also do more.

In the words of the Apostle Paul:

"If I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am but a clanging gong or a crashing symbol." (1 Corinthians 13:1)

ARCHITECTURE HAPPENING, NOT MERELY EXISTING

Power plant is one of the more kinetic realities on campus

KRIS EMMONS
Collegian

The power plant was completed in 1928 at a cost of $315,000. The design itself was from faculty in the College of Architecture, a tradition that has since died out.

There's something grand about the building, particularly the giant smoke stack soaring into the air — a good landmark second only to Memorial Stadium. It's astonishing no one has suggested the ostentatious idea of painting a powercat on its upper reaches (please, campus public relations gurus, don't get any ideas).

No, the simplicity of the smoke stack's design and colors — a white cylindrical shaft, crowned by an enlarged, ringed capital decorated with a minimal ring of black stripes.

From the viewpoint of any pedestrian walking between Seaton and Durland halls, the smokestack stands over them, rising elegantly above the mishmash of pipes, chillers, ducts and steam tunnels below.

On a chilly day, when the smoke casts a billowy shadow over the west side of campus, and the limestone exterior of the plant is cast in a grey hue, one gets the sense of a Charles Sheeler precisionist landscape, celebrating industrial achievement.

Walking in front of the east facade, which itself was inspired in part by the 1927 Farrell Library building, one gets another sense altogether.

Look past the muck of the transformers and electrical power stations cluttering the ground level; look past the horrid Lafene Student Health Center building, which successfully destroys the once-interesting quad between Leasure and Seaton halls and the library. Perhaps the quad can be restored if one of the cannons mounted in the towers of the new library conveniently went off in the west direction.

In the early evening, the lights from within the plant glow inside, shining on equipment that looks as if it runs Hoover Dam. One senses the very quality of power, of enormity cast down upon us.

The east facade exudes the same force the vast concrete of the Tuttle Creek spillway superstructure gestures in its repeated bays and colossal piers. Both structures would do very well as a setting in a film noir movie.

There was to be a west facade to front then un-neutered 17th Street, but alas, another campus project fades from existence. Perhaps it's not too late to reconsider, a west facade would finally give Durland Hall the presence it so desperately needs, albeit via reflection.

To appreciate the grandeur of the east facade, one needs to walk no further than to the north facade, if it could be called as such. The remainder of the plant consists of tacked-on industrial sheds and the recently completed central plant.

The exterior of the new buildings do not suggest the same command of space or functionality the old building so easily accomplishes. No, the blank facade could stand for any building on this campus — Ackert, King or any of the innumerable other faceless buildings to the north of the main campus.

However, the new chiller's cooling tower, a raucous monotone of falling water hidden behind a minimalist louver, adds the requisite soundtrack to a complete picture.

Further enhancing the sensuous nature of the power complex, the very thought that a pipe, tunnel or nondescript unit could burst in an explosion of steam, gas or fire — however unlikely — disrupts our reality for the brief minute we walk by the building.

Where else on this campus can one be unsettled simply by the presence of a building? And the fact the power plant is no singular architectural expression, but rather the build-up over time of necessary functions in one central site, only reinforces the success of the building as a reality.

No other bit of self-conscious architectural fluff has been nearly as successful on this campus, save for the obvious play of form and function in the sleek greenhouses behind Throckmorton Hall.

The smokestack rests among those architectural oddities we don't readily acknowledge as part of our daily experience. Grain elevators being another.

And what of campus preservation? Why not add this landmark structure, along with Memorial Stadium and others, to a list of campus necessities — those being icons that whose absence would deflate campus.

The power plant is architecture happening, a kinetic force on a static campus. It's a visual cue, not directly literal, other buildings could do well to follow.

Kansas Board of Regents proposes health insurance for GTAs, GRAs

MATT KREPS
staff writer

The Kansas Board of Regents has introduced legislation that would require all graduate teaching assistants and graduate research assistants at regents schools to be offered a health insurance plan.

Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene Health Center, said the bill is relatively simple.

"The legislation would basically state that there could be a state health plan for students at the state level," Zweimiller said.

The issue of health insurance is different at each university. Zweimiller said the students at the University of Kansas wanted to have insurance coverage. Students at K-State already have the option of enrolling in a student health insurance plan through Lafene and a private insurance carrier.

"Currently GTAs and GRAs who are students have the option of participating in the student health insurance plan that was adopted by the Student Health Advisory Committee," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

The legislation does not specify if the plan will use a private carrier or the state employee plan. If the state plan was used, there could be serious side effects for K-State, Zweimiller said.

In the current insurance model, Lafene is the primary provider for student health needs. This reduces service costs and lowers premiums. The more people who enroll in the plan, the lower the premiums are.

The premiums for student basic coverage now are from $480 to $690 depending on age. As of Oct. 20, 301 students had enrolled in the plan and applications were still being taken.

"I would just as soon see the GTAs and GRAs put into the current plan at this university, which would increase the enrollment and bring the premium down," Zweimiller said.

Rod Vogl, graduate student in psychology, said a health insurance plan would benefit graduate students. He said he knows several students who have no insurance because of cost.

"It's too expensive for most grad students to maintain," Vogl said.

Stacia Gray, graduate student in English, said she would use a university plan instead of a private carrier if K-State's plan was less expensive.

"I think it could be very helpful, because we don't make much," Gray said.

Karinne Cortes, graduate student in biochemistry, said she has health insurance through her husband's military benefits but would be interested in a student plan. She would like to have a dental plan included, she said.

Bosco said he is already talking to people about how a state plan could affect K-State.

"We've been trying to educate key decision-makers — both on and off the campus — that this could have a detrimental effect on our ability to finance the student health center and provide a reasonable price for students, whether they be GTAs or undergraduates, who want student health insurance," Bosco said.

Ultimate Frisbee philanthropy faces problems, needs more organizations to enter tournament

BYRON VOGEL
staff reporter

The Acacia fraternity's ultimate frisbee tournament still needs entrants.

Acacia's first-year philanthropy, which will benefit Shriner's Burn and Crippled Children's Center, faces postponement or cancellation if too few entries are received by the Sept. 26 deadline, Charles Purma, Acacia internal philanthropy chairman, said.

GREEK LIFE

"Right now the word really hasn't gotten out," Purma said. "We're hoping to have a lot more teams so the tournament can build up some steam."

The double-elimination tournament is scheduled from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Oct. 5 at Memorial Stadium. Each team will field seven players at a time, but Purma said substitutions are highly recommended.

Entry fees are $30 per team, and $10 for each additional team that an organization wishes to field. Trophies will be awarded to the top two teams.

Those who have questions or want to participate can contact Purma at 776-3381, or visit the Acacia house at 2005 Hunting Ave.

Cats to battle Team USA

DAWN CADY of the K-State volleyball team, hits the ball during a match against Texas-Arlington. The Cats won in three games.

IVAN KOZAR
Collegian

The K-State volleyball team strategically plans its non-conference opponents to help prepare for Big 12 play.

Conference play starts Friday, and the Wildcats have played against several types of teams.

The Cats played against a few not-so-good teams — the University of Texas at Arlington, Boise State and San Francisco, to name a few. In these matches, the Cats played to easy 3-0 victories and learned to play as a team and in system.

K-State also played against some tough opponents, including matches at No. 11 Hawaii and No. 20 Maryland.

Against those teams, the Cats had to step up the intensity to remain competitive.

But none of the teams K-State has faced will compare with its next opponent. Monday, the Cats will face the USA Women's National Volleyball Team, the team that represents the United States at the Olympics.

"It's really exciting. We've seen the national team play, and this is like a little kid's dream come true. They're going to be on the same court as I am," junior middle blocker Val Wieck said.

K-State will be the first of nine stops for the national team. Five of the nine matches will be against Big 12 teams, seven of the nine against top-25 teams and three against top-six teams, including No. 1 Penn State.

"They called me and said, 'Would you do this?' And I said, absolutely, because it's good for Manhattan — this is the highest level of volleyball in our country at this point in time, and it gives our girls exposure," Coach Jim McLaughlin said. "There are a couple of girls on our team who could put on the USA jersey some day."

McLaughlin said K-State won't attack the match any differently than a match against an NCAA opponent. However, the Cats will probably showcase two players — Wieck and junior hitter Kim Zschau — who McLaughlin thinks could eventually play for the national team.

"We're going to try to expose our strengths and hide our weaknesses, just like we would against anybody," McLaughlin said. "But I'll tell you one thing we're going to do. We're going to try to get Val Wieck and Kim Zschau the ball and go heat against heat. We're not going to worry about the match-up. We're going to go our best against their best. I can't wait for the match. I think it's going to be fun."

Although playing against a team that is better than any NCAA team is exciting for the Cats, they know the match won't be easy.

"It's going to be at such a higher level," Wieck said. "It's going to be so fast."

Last year, the USA team completed its tour without losing a game, let alone a match, McLaughlin said.

Still, the Cats will try to push the USA team's game as high as they can.

"We're gonna throw every punch we have at them and see where we end up," McLaughlin said. "We're gonna keep going at them. We're gonna be so aggressive, we might be a little bit crazy."

One advantage of the match for the Cats is that they will be used to the higher level of competition when they resume Big 12 play — the matches that matter.

Wieck compares the match to a time when she and Zschau tried out for a national team for the World University Games. Although the World University Games are not on a level with the Olympics, they are still a step up from NCAA competition, Wieck said.

She said they practiced with elite players for three days and noticed a change when they returned to the Cats.

"When we got back, it seemed like practice was so slow," she said.

Wieck expects K-State to go through the same process after playing the national team. She said practice will be faster the day after the game, and the Cats could carry the quick tempo into their Oct. 1 match at intrastate rival Kansas.

"That's a factor that needs to be decided on," she said. "When we get into practice, we'll ask, 'Is this the level to expect every time?'"

Rec officials provide backbone for successful, fun intramurals

MICHAEL RYAN
staff reporter

"You're blind, ref!" "You need glasses!" and "How can you make that call?" are all common phrases that intramural sports officials hear during athletic events.

Assistant Intramural Director Ron Miller said being an official is not an easy job.

"It takes a special person to deal with criticism on a daily basis," Miller said.

Nikki Wilson, senior in secondary education and athletic training, started officiating flag football this year after playing the previous four years.

Listening to people gripe about calls just to have something to gripe about is the toughest part of officiating, Wilson said. She also said trying to watch everything at once is very tough to do.

Miller, however, said the toughest thing for officials to grasp is accepting criticism.

"Being able to separate personal criticism and criticism of your call is the toughest thing to understand," he said.

"The biggest problem we face is society."

Officials at professional levels should be expected to take more criticism considering they are making a lot more money than intramural officials who start at $5.40 a game, Miller said.

Ryan Pursley, junior in biology and pre-med, is in his third year of being an intramural official. Pursley said the biggest problem he encounters is when participants watch the college and pro games and then come to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex expecting to play by the same rules, even though there are drastic changes in each sport.

This fall, getting officials has been a problem for Miller. He said he wanted to have 45 officials for flag football, but he only has 30.

He said that many students worked all summer and have money so they don't want to work at the beginning of the semester.

Miller estimated 40 percent of the officials returned from last year and those students usually do all the sports for intramurals. Freshmen usually fill in the remaining positions.

Due to the low numbers, many games are being officiated with two-person crews instead of the customary three-person crew, Miller said. He said some officials are working as many as 20 games a week because of the shortage.

Miller, Wilson and Pursley all agreed that for the most part there is good sportsmanship in the intramural program. Miller added he is impressed by the new officials.

"The officials are very important. Would you want to play an officiated game or call your own? Without officials we can't have games," Miller said. "I would hate to imagine an intramural program without officials."

Snyder unimpressed by receivers, uses bye week for extra practice

▸ HALFBACK MIKE LAWRENCE COULD start at wide receiver against Bowling Green.

Sometimes passing and catching the ball isn't as easy as it looks.

Offered as proof, the 23-20 win over Ohio left Coach Bill Snyder unsatisfied with the play of his receivers and his quarterbacks. The teams leading receiver is tight end Justin Swift, who has four catches over two games with two touchdowns.

"We knew coach was going to come out and be hard on us this week," Everett Burnett, wide receiver, said.

As a result, Mike Lawrence was penciled in as the the team's No. 1 wide receiver on the depth chart. Lawrence has caught two passes this year for a total 12 yards.

"Mike has great hands," Michael Bishop said. "If I throw it low or if I throw it high, I know Mike is going to catch it."

But Snyder said Lawrence might not even see time on the field as a receiver. He said putting Lawrence on the depth chart was done on the spur of the moment. However, Snyder is serious about the move.

"I'm serious about it for two reasons," Snyder said. "One, we haven't been that successful at that position, and two is the fact that we have three very fine running backs."

The focus the past two weeks for the receivers and the quarterbacks has been fundamentals. The receivers are catching 50 balls before and after each practice. The quarterbacks are throwing 200 to 300 passes at practice.

In the Ohio game, quarterbacks Bishop and Jonathan Beasley were only able to complete three passes to the wide receivers. Bishop and Beasley only threw for a combined 102 yards. Only one receiver, Gavin Peries, caught more than one pass.

"We know we're going to be accountable for each play," Burnett said. "We play a huge part in the offense, and people are going to be looking for us to make plays."

For his part, Bishop said he has focused on not releasing the ball too soon and too high during his throwing motion to improve

Ryder Cup more than just drives, chips, putts — it's gut check time for golf's finest

SUN DEE MILLS

SUN DEE MILLS is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send your e-mail comments to Sun Dee at sundee@ksu.edu

The golfer stepped up to the tee.

A thin veil of perspiration broke out across his forehead.

Shaking from nerves, the golfer's arms and legs went numb as the club took on an unfamiliar, baseball bat-like quality.

No, this isn't me teeing off at Stagg Hill's longest par-three. This is European Ryder Cup team member Colin Montgomerie in 1995 as he teed off for Friday's first matches.

That shaky, nerve-wracking feeling in the pit of my stomach is normal; I pick up my golf clubs about once a month if I can find the time. But for Montgomerie and the other PGA golfers who live and die by their chip shots, the Ryder Cup should be old hat.

It's not.

Both American and European golfers on the PGA Tour are used to large galleries of people following them from hole to hole on their quest to beat the guy two strokes ahead of them. They often refer to themselves or the course they're playing as their toughest competition in a championship.

Not so in Sotogrande, Spain, home of Valderrama Golf Club and the site of the biennial 32nd Ryder Cup Championship.

Here, the pros will be reduced to the throes of war — the championship earned the nickname War by the Shore in 1991 — that overtook these two conflicting continents a little more than 200 years ago.

Frenzied flag-waving fans will flock to the championship to catch a glimpse of Tiger Woods as he attempts to assist his country in repossessing the precious trophy.

To make matters worse, one-third of the 12-member American team has never seen Ryder Cup action, and five players have felt the intense pressure only once before.

No matter how many times Davis Love III, Freddy Couples and Mark O'Meara have stepped up to the proverbial plate in their professional careers, they only combine for nine visits to this championship.

These three golfers, along with team captain Tom Kite, make up the experienced core of the team. But experience doesn't mean much when your team is as unfamiliar with the course as the Americans claim to be.

Competition has heated up over the last 10 years.

The Cup has changed homes three times since 1985, but the almost-30 years before that found the trophy consistently living on American soil.

The shore of the Spanish Mediterranean will see a battle more controversial than the Tyson-Holyfield scandal, more intense than the K-State vs. Nebraska football game, and more emotional than Michael Jordan's Bulls championship win on Fathers' Day.

In fact, the two teams are already battling — for the underdog role.

The Americans haven't played the course, but the Europeans are convinced that Valderrama's fast greens will give the Stars and Stripes a distinct advantage.

All this intrigue makes getting up at 7 a.m. Friday to watch the competition get underway seem almost worth it.

But the most intriguing factor is this: There is no money involved.

No one rakes in a $250,000 paycheck. No one gets half that for second place. The trophy isn't split 12 ways.

Heck, Tiger can't even wear his red Nike sweatshirt on the last day of the championship. No player is allowed to endorse a sponsor on their hat or shirt.

There lies the beauty of this championship. Much like Olympic competition, these players are in it solely to bring home the "gold" for their country.

This is why Mark Calcavecchia almost hyperventilated and why Lanny Wadkins broke down in tears in the 1991 championship.

This is why Love III almost threw up two years later when he was locked in a singles' battle with Constantino Rocca.

It had nothing to do with a Titleist contract or a Big Bertha commercial. This championship gets back to the basics of sport: The brave but intense spirit of competition.

Rookie Ryder Cup team member Jim Furyk told ESPN SportsZone that he knows all 24 players will feel the same gut-wrenching, sickened feeling that Love III felt in 1993.

But the image of the U.S. flag gently waving in the breeze to the rhythm of the National Anthem prevails when Furyk verbalizes the heart of the matter.

"Playing for your country — it's the ultimate honor," he said.

And the Home of the Brave just got braver.

'A Chorus Line' HIGH KICKS into McCain

COURTESY PHOTO/Jeriko Entertainment

THE CAST of "A Chorus Line" performs the traditional chorus kick line. The Jeriko Entertainment tour performed in Tuesday night in McCain Auditorium.

"One (Singular Sensation)" is the signature song from Marvin Hamlisch's "A Chorus Line," which played in McCain Auditorium Tuesday night at 8 p.m. McCain was one stop on the tour's eight-month, nationwide tour.

However, there was more than one sensational thing to see in Jeriko Entertainment's production of the Tony Award-winning show.

Review
Theater

"A Chorus Line," a musical set in 1975 in a Broadway theater in New York, NY., depicts the lives of dancers trying to make it in the Big Apple. The cast is made up solely of dancers who can sing rather than singers who can move well, as most other musicals often are.

The plot revolves around a typical audition for the chorus line of a Broadway show. This "typical" audition soon uncovers an unexpected twist, one that the dancers have to deal with throughout the entire show.

The stage was set by revealing floor-length mirrors that stretched across the back of the stage. Initially, 24 cast members began the show stretching out and learning a dance combination from Zach, the show's choreographer and director, played by Matthew T. Johnson.

When Zach was satisfied the dancers knew the routines, he came out to the audience to sit and watch them perform.

The audience got to share Zach's frustrations with casting his show as he became part of the audience.

The 24 dancers soon were cut to 17, and the song that accompanied the cutting process, "I Hope I Get It," was sung loudly and in unison. The cast wasn't jelling vocally in this first number, but the director may have been interested in a garish sound of the nervousness that accompanied the cattle-call audition.

Zach then asked the remaining dancers to tell him about themselves, which doesn't usually happen at an audition. Dancers who were used to handing out a picture and résumé, smiling a lot and dancing their hearts out to get a job began telling Zach, a stranger, intimate details about their personal lives.

Three women formed a trio of singers and described how they got into dancing in "At The Ballet." Sheila, a dancer pushing 30 and facing her last years in the chorus played by Kirsten E. Gerding, revealed her father's infidelity. Bebe, played Petra Van Nuis, joined her and said her mother told her she'd never be a pretty girl. Finally, Maggie, played by Erin Malloy, told about her parents having her to save their marriage, which didn't work.

The trio reached a beautiful crescendo at the end, and the audience awarded Maggie's high note with applause.

During the number "Sing," Kristine, played by Erin Hunter, told Zach how she could never learn how to sing. Her husband, Al (Spenser T. Rowe), offered funny musical interjections when she couldn't remember what she wanted to say. The cast then proved they could sing harmonies at the end of the number.

Val, a dancer from the Midwest played by Pattie Ford, vividly described her move to New York and her constant rejection at dance chorus auditions. She swiped her dance card to learn that she was getting a "10" for dance, but a "3" for looks. The number "Dance: Ten, Looks: Three" was a hilarious description of how Val acquired silicone implants to enhance her career.

In a rare solo moment, Cassie, Zach's old girlfriend (played by Lori Melissa Marshburn) who left him to pursue an acting career in Hollywood, desperately pleaded with Zach to give her a chance in the chorus. Because she had been a featured dancer on Broadway years before, Zach insisted she was too good for the chorus. "The Music and The Mirror" was Cassie's song and dance to prove to Zach she could do the job.

The lighting changed prophetically as the mood of the song changed, and as the solo dancer in the mirror, Cassie performed well enough to convince Zach and the audience that she should get a chance.

The most moving moment in the show came in Paul's monologue about his rise in show business as a female dancer in a drag show. Although the monologue lasted about 10 minutes, the audience never stirred. When Paul, played by Eric Sciotto, said his parents showed up to see him unannounced and he broke down in tears in front of Zach, his performance evoked enthusiastic applause.

"A Chorus Line" was performed without an intermission, and the end came before anyone was expecting it. After the eight dancers were chosen for the new musical Zach was choreographing, they quickly exited the stage for their only costume change.

One by one, the cast members immediately returned to perform "One (Singular Sensation)," and the dancers took their own bows as the line moved across the stage. When the entire cast appeared, they did the routine they had been working on in the show from beginning to end.

The audience couldn't get enough of the ending, applauding it soundly. The cast formed the traditional chorus kick line and kicked for at least 36 counts while the audience enjoyed a sensational ending to a sensational show.

Measure for Measure
Friday, October 3, 8p.m.
Public: $18, Seniors: $16, Students: $9

Will Isabella trade her virginity for her brother's life? That's her dilemma as she pleads to save her brother, who has been sentenced to death for impregnating his unmarried lover. It may sound like an R-rated movie, but this, folks, is Shakespeare.

Measure for Measure is one of Shakespeare's most well-crafted plays, but is often overlooked in favor of the more famous tragedies, histories, and comedies. By today's standards it is a "dark" comedy that probes both the relationship of law and morality in the state and human behavior under stress. Don't miss out when Actors from the London Stage perform this morally intriguing play.

Proposal requires mergers for 3 community colleges

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Coffeyville and Independence community colleges would have to merge under a college funding proposal given tentative approval Tuesday by the interim Committee on Community College Governance.

The plan, a combination of proposals by the committee's eight members, would force the merger of the two Montgomery County community colleges and Southeast Kansas Area Vocational-Technical School and force Seward County Community College to merge with Liberal Area Vocational School.

As an incentive to get the schools to merge, the state would provide each of the merged institutions with special grants. The plan calls for $250,000 each year for two years, but the committee will revisit that issue to see if providing a percentage of a school's budget might work better.

The grants also would go to schools that merged voluntarily.

The committee plans to make recommendations to the 1998 Legislature on overhauling the system for financing the state's 19 community colleges.

The merger mandate proposal came as a surprise to officials of the community colleges.

"The board's position has been in the past that we would not be interested in merging the two schools," said Rick Smith of the Independence Community College Board of Trustees. "There has been no indication of any cost savings to the taxpayers."

"The only thing I can say is mergers are complex," said Coffeyville Community College trustee Warren Thomas. He said he would like to see a study done to show whether savings can be achieved.

But members of the legislative panel said saving money is not the primary goal. Better coordination among colleges and addressing the perception that southeast Kansas has too many community colleges are just as high priorities, they said.

The committee's chairwoman, Rep. Cindy Empson, R-Independence, said she favors consolidation of the three Montgomery schools and believes the public does, too.

"I will support it," she said. "I think its time has come. Many people feel it makes no sense to have three schools in the county. Every time community colleges are mentioned, it comes up that Montgomery County has two of them.

"I believe that if you put it to a vote in the county, you're going to have overwhelming support for combining the two community colleges."

Details of guidelines and conditions for merging the schools have yet to be worked out in the proposed legislation. The panel meets again Oct. 9 and 10.

The committee also plans to make a recommendation on which state agency should supervise the community colleges, which now are under direction of the Kansas State Board of Education.

Consensus of the committee was that the state's two-year public colleges should remain where they are — under the Board of Education — but perhaps with an advisory committee to cause the state board to pay more attention to them.

"I know the community colleges are very happy where they are (and) very opposed to being transferred to the Board of Regents for coordination," Empson said.

Key elements of the community college funding proposal include the following:

- Require community colleges and area vocational schools in counties with populations under 100,000 to merge, with the state providing an incentive payment of $250,000 to be paid each year for two years to the merged institutions.
- Retain credit hour and out-district state aid programs to finance community colleges. State aid is now $24 per credit hour.
- Eliminate out-district tuition now paid by counties whose students attend a community college in another county. This money would be replaced by state operating grants to the colleges.
- Put a ceiling on local property taxes to support the community colleges at 15 mills.
- Provide state operating grants to the colleges to replace the lost property tax and out-district tuition revenue.

The committee withheld judgment on one plank in the community college funding proposal: whether to eliminate the 64-hour limit on academic out-district state aid.

That would mean the colleges would receive state aid for students that go beyond taking 64 hours of work at the schools.

Russia to alter nuclear plants

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — Vice President Al Gore signed a long-sought deal Tuesday with Russia to convert three nuclear weapons plants to civilian use, a move seen as a significant step away from the nuclear legacy of the Cold War.

Besides putting an end to plutonium-producing reactors in Russia, the agreement places a cap on U.S. and Russian stockpiles of nuclear weapons-grade plutonium.

The Clinton administration has been pushing for the accord for years, part of U.S. efforts to ensure that Moscow safeguards and reduces its vast nuclear stockpile.

"It's so historic. It's so important for world peace," said U.S. Energy Secretary Federico Pena, who took part in the discussions with Gore.

The agreement would convert Russia's three remaining plutonium-producing plants in Siberia to production of uranium for civilian power plants. It also would prohibit Russia from using recently produced plutonium in nuclear weapons.

The plant conversions, to begin in 2000, will take place with technical assistance and money from the United States. All other former plutonium-producing reactors in both countries must remain closed.

Gore, who signed the agreement with Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, said it makes a huge contribution to world nuclear nonproliferation.

"I'm very pleased to announce that after much hard work, we took an important, perhaps even historic, step this week when we reached agreement to halt production of weapons-grade plutonium in both the United States and Russia," Gore said.

Preventing the spread of nuclear weapons technology topped a long list of issues that Gore worked on for two days with Chernomyrdin during the latest session of the Gore-Chernomyrdin commission.

The commission has been meeting twice a year since 1993. The two chairmen announced on Tuesday the signing of 10 agreements on space, technology and trade, among other issues.

Gore also met Tuesday with Russian President Boris Yeltsin to try to smooth tensions over Iran. Russia is helping Iran build a nuclear power plant, and the United States fears the technology could be used to develop a nuclear bomb.

Officials on both sides were reluctant to share details of the talks, citing intelligence concerns. But Chernomyrdin said: "We have commitments (to Iran) and aren't deviating from them."

Russian officials insist they are not providing any technology or parts that would help Iran or other nations acquire long-range missiles or nuclear weapons.

Clinching the conversion deal has been a Washington priority since June 1994, when the two sides signed an agreement to shut down the Siberian reactors, two in Seversk and one in Zheleznogorsk. The Russians never allowed that accord to take effect because they said there was no other way to provide heat and electricity to those regions.

After feasibility studies and more talks, the two sides finally approved a joint plan estimated to cost $150 million. Of that total, the United States is providing up to $10 million this year and as much as $70 million later. Russia will provide the rest. U.S. and Russian contractors will share the conversion work.

Yeltsin was in a jovial mood at the start of the Kremlin talks.

"I'm ready not only to fight with Americans, but to cooperate with them," he said. He paused and then added: "When I said fight, I meant fight on the diplomatic front."

Before the meeting, Gore and his wife, Tipper, strolled just outside the Kremlin, admiring a new pedestrian square that is a showpiece of Moscow's massive post-Soviet reconstruction.

Symbols, words combine in art

RUSSELL FORMEYER
senior staff writer

It's been nearly three years since the Willard Gallery has presented a politically charged show of feminist art.

That past, infamous group show of local women artists was a muddled mess of schlock and syrup, with a few glimpses of what could be called art. Needless to say, the gallery has wisely stayed away from staging a similar show since (and so, too, has this writer from reviewing).

Just the words "feminist artist" have become as charged as the works of the artists they describe. This wordplay brings us to the work of Janet Davidson-Hues, whose solo exhibition is in the Willard Gallery until Oct. 3.

Davidson-Hues' work, which she proudly touts as "an alarm to warn about female complicity, realized or latent," reduces narrative to symbols and words; no longer is it necessary for a collection of images to cohere to form a narrative.

Art Review

Her work sometimes stylistically recalls the early work of Robert Rauschenberg, especially in its ability to take cliches and common objects and let them remain just that, however wholly recast in a new context. Unlike Rauschenberg, this work doesn't celebrate its use of objects with nearly as much glee or painterly fun.

"Hello, Halo, Hat," is a good example of how Davidson-Hues can sometimes sabotage her own symbols. The main thrust of the work, a campy Warholian repeated female portrait sitting to the left of a red door inserted into a book, is lessened by a frame of the words "She no longer wishes to live in the houses or stories of men." Is the redundancy that necessary?

Her work, particularly her inclusion of found objects, brings with it many contexts, though mainly all owing to some feminine aspect. The repeated use of a white wedding gown, a bird cage, rice and references to father figures make the paintings vital, for the most part narrowly averting any cluttering of message.

In her "Daddy's Girl" series, instead of illustrating any instances of a little girl in the throes of a male-dominated culture that is defining her existence without her consent, the audience is told what is happening through words and symbols.

In "Daddy's Girl: Our Father," bold, black capital letters against a red background spell out the scene: "Her daddy asked her to climb up onto his lap." Reaching up from the floor, a white ladder rests against the painting along the spelling of the word "onto."

The curator Henry Geldzahler wrote in 1964 of Rauschenberg's work, "He presents us not with the interpretation of an experience (a ladder, umbrella, tire, glass, or chair), but with the experience itself." In "Our Father," Davidson-Hues does the opposite; her work is telling, not showing, us the information.

Perhaps this is the artist's way of disconnecting herself from her subject. It's also an effective method of ambiguity, allowing viewers the opportunity of discussion, which is fine, because there isn't as much to see as there is to read in any one painting.

SONIA WALSK and Vernon Gersch discuss their musical talents in the play, "They're Playing Our Song" based on the book by Neil Simon. Walsk is played by Diana Yamabayashi, senior in theater, and Gersch is played by Joel Morrison, senior in music education.

Musical promises laughs, seriousness

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Neil Simon and Marvin Hamlisch are easily two of the most recognizable names in popular American theater.

Simon, the Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright of such community theater mainstays as "Barefoot in the Park," "The Odd Couple" and the movie "The Goodbye Girl," and Hamlisch, the Pulitzer Prize-winning composer of "A Chorus Line," have helped define popular culture in the past 30 years.

But who has heard of their early-1970s musical collaboration "They're Playing Our Song"

Shelly Holle, director of the Manhattan Center for the Arts Theatre Company's production of the show, which opens Friday, said she made sure the publicity highlighted the fact it was a Simon show because of its relative obscurity.

"It was done in the 1970s and based on the characters of Marvin Hamlisch and Carol Bayer Sager. They worked together and had an intimate relationship, shall we say, which also happens to the characters in the show," Holle said.

The two leads, Vernon Gersch and Sonia Walsk, played respectively by Joel Morrison and Diana Yamabayashi, are frustrated songwriters who must create five songs together, only to find they are falling in love. The two leads carry the show, being on stage the entire time and with all of the lines.

"This is a musical where there's a purpose for people to be singing on stage," Holle said.

Hamlisch provides contemporary pop references in the score — at least references that are contemporary by 1970s standards. In a disco scene, actual music from the BeeGees and Elton John is used for a more realistic mix.

"There is no way people are going to leave here without humming at least one of the songs from the show," Holle said.

The show also uses a Greek chorus device to play off of the two leads: Vernon has his boys and Sonia her girls.

"There are a couple little gimmicks in there that make it fun and not the sappy little boy-meets-girl musicals of the 1940s," Holle said.

Theater Review

Holle said the original musical had a short Broadway run because of difficulty finding the right combination of replacements for the leads.

The arts center production had its own problems when Holle had to recast the show in late August because the leads dropped out.

She turned to K-State students in the show to help her replace cast members and ended up with an entire cast of K-State students.

Yamabayashi, senior in theater, said she identifies with Sonia's being in love and getting her heart broken.

"She's such a lovable flake," Yamabayashi said. "She's endearing. I go through the same emotions she does, but hers are magnefied 100 times."

Yamabayashi, familiar to K-State audiences as a regular in dance and theater department productions, is busy this month. She is also cast as a member of K-State's upcoming "Man of La Mancha," WinterDance and a student dance recital.

Morrison, who is also a cast member of "La Mancha," said he feels pressure because this is the largest part he's ever played.

"I've never had a lead of this magnitude before where so much was riding on me," Morrison, junior in music education, said. "We're on stage all the time, keeping the show going."

Woman accuses sportscaster of pressuring for 3-way sex

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ARLINGTON, Va. — The woman who has accused Marv Albert of attacking her in a hotel room took the stand Tuesday, telling a jury he pressured her for three-way sex and threw her down on the bed after asking her "Why are you wearing a robe?"

The defense cross-examination got under way with lawyers playing a tape in which the woman appears to coach a potential witness.

Albert

The woman, 42, testified the violence was a new aspect to their 10-year sexual relationship, where previously "he would lead me very gently."

Her voice began to break and became lower as she described the Feb. 12 hotel room encounter that led to criminal charges against the NBC sportscaster.

She testified for the prosecution for a little more than an hour Tuesday morning. She told jurors she repeatedly protested, telling Albert that she had back problems and that he was hurting her. She said he began to bite her and later forced her mouth open to perform oral sex, saying "You're enjoying this. You enjoy rough sex."

She said he told her that she was a bad girl for not bringing along another man for three-way sex, using an angry, scolding voice as she quoted him. She had testified he had called her at home the night before and asked her if she had anyone in mind yet and what scenarios they could create for their sexual encounter.

When Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney Barbara Walker asked her why she didn't flatly reject Albert's request, she said: "He would be too relentless. He would be too persuasive."

She testified about a tender scene in the hotel room as they kissed and began to disrobe. The woman said the mood turned sharply after she came out of the bathroom wearing a robe.

"He said, 'Why are you wearing a robe?' and I said I had put on some weight and felt embarrassed." After Albert helped her remove the robe she said he then grabbed her by the waist and threw her on the bed and jumped on her lower back.

When the cross-examination phase began this afternoon, jurors heard a tape recording in which the woman is heard telling a potential witness, "You know what to say."

In the tape, the accuser is speaking with a taxicab driver she knows about his possibly testifying in her behalf. She wanted the driver to tell prosecutors he picked up Albert and that Albert asked him to procure a boy.

The driver is heard saying, "I'm too old for this. You owe me $50,000 and a new car."

She told the court the driver had in fact told her Albert had asked him about getting a boy, so she was just encouraging him to tell the truth, and the discussion about the money was in jest. But the judge allowed the tape to be played for jurors after she acknowledged the voice was hers.

Apparently referring to prosecutor Walker, she can be heard saying, "tell her what we talked about, that when you went to pick him up, that he asked you that he wanted to get a boy."

Also this afternoon, the judge made a series of rulings, disallowing some defense lines of questioning, including information about complaints the woman had made about other boyfriends. The judge did allow defense questioning about some medication the woman was taking.

During her testimony earlier in the day, prosecutors played a recording of a minute-long 911 call she made to police. Much of it was unintelligible, but it was clear she was sobbing throughout.

"He grabbed me and threw me on the bed and started biting on my back," she is heard saying.

The woman did not identify her attacker other than as a longtime friend, saying he became angry because she failed to bring another person for a threesome. She told police she did not need an ambulance, but said her back was full of bites.

During cross-examination, defense attorney Roy Black got her to acknowledge that Albert had no weapon and never struck her during the encounter.

Their sex life changed from conventional encounters when Albert began asking her to indulge his fantasies for a threesome, either with another man or another woman, she said.

Albert took notes and occasionally rocked in his chair.

The trial is expected to last a week.

Program Council, said UPC stretches the $2 that every student pays for UPC as far as it can to provide quality entertainment.

Wendy Strevey-Tien, chair of the Fine Arts Council, said her group is increasingly strapped for funds and is forced to turn down requests to fund art projects on campus.

Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications Inc., said the company only depends on student fees for one-quarter of its budget. Most of the money that goes toward the production of the Collegian, the Royal Purple and the Campus Directory is generated by advertising sales. He said he considered the privilege fee payment a partnership with the student body.

On a similar note, Urick said $14 million of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletic's budget is self-generating, mostly through ticket sales.

Otto said much of the privilege fee budget, such as the repair and maintenance reserve for Bramlage Coliseum, shouldn't be controversial. The committee will prepare its budget next month for Student Senate's approval, he said.

At the end of the meeting, Otto asked the panel what they would do if their groups had unlimited resources. All were pragmatic.

Donovan said he'd like UPC to be able to sponsor larger and more expensive entertainment, like big-name bands.

Strevey-Tien said it would be nice to approve all the requests for financial aid from artists and groups that cross her desk, instead of having to tell most of them to raise more funds on their own.

"We're very rarely able to give students what they ask for because of our budget constraints," she said.

Zweimiller's ideal, he said, would simply be to control costs and meet the demand for services. The move off campus is still being considered for more space and parking, he said, but it won't happen until Mercy is able to move its operations from the Sunset Avenue facility.

Urick said he'd like to have meetings about how many more seats K-State students would like to reserve for the stadium expansion when and if it happens. The expansion could increase the number of student-reserved seats from 7,500 to as many as 10,000, he said.

Johnson remembered how the cost of newsprint went up 65 percent in one year and limited his ideal to some improvements to the eCollegian and continuing support for the Royal Purple CD-ROM addendum.

"We'd just like to keep getting publications into the hands of students," he said.

each individual plant has its own purifying process.

"Here, we remove minerals that other places may not, and because of that, our water may taste different, but it's just as safe," he said.

In fact, Manhattan's water is relatively safe to drink. Coming from local wells, not lakes or streams, it is much easier to treat, Kincy said.

Water plants abide by federal regulations, and because of this, the water is safe.

"The state takes about 40 samples of our water a month, analyzing what's in our water and what we take out," Kincy said.

"In the 20 years I've worked here at the plant, Manhattan has never had a bad sample, and we don't plan on seeing one anytime soon."

his play. He attributed these two inconsistencies to his inaccuracy. Bishop possesses the highest quarterback ranking in the Big 12. In the Ohio game, Bishop threw 14 times and completed three passes.

"We just have to go out there and pay attention to what's going on and make the right decisions," Bishop said. "It's going to be a different game on Saturday."

Snyder said the receivers and quarterbacks have shown marked improvement in the nine days since the Ohio game.

In Monday's practice, the receivers did not drop one ball, Bishop said.

But it's not just a matter of catching the ball, if you ask Burnett.

"I've started stepping my playing and my leadership ability up," Burnett said. "If I see one of my teammates is down, I'm going to pick him up."

Jelling together as a unit has been a high priority for the receivers, Burnett said.

If Burnett's prediction is correct, the receiving core will start playing a larger role in the offense.

"We know each of us can make plays, or we wouldn't be here," Burnett said.

ICC to sponsor Olympics

LANDON TRAWNY
staff reporter

If you ever dreamed about winning the gold medal in the Olympics, this is your chance.

The International Coordinating Council is planning the first International Olympics at K-State.

Manuri Nakkawita, senior in advertising and president of the ICC, said ICC decided to have the International Olympics instead of International Night, which has consisted of a dance and other activities in the past.

She said the ICC wanted to try something new because even though International Night is open to all K-State students, the festivities have usually drawn international students.

Nausheen Kazi, ICC vice president, said the main idea of the International Olympics is to have international students and American students interact with each other directly.

"We want to expand ourselves to the entire student body," Kazi said.

Nakkawita said there are 95 countries represented at K-State, including the United States. She also said most students do not realize this, and the Olympics would be an easy way for students to meet and learn more about each other.

"This is something all students can be involved with," Nakkawita said.

The ICC is planning to put teams together so students from different countries are on the same teams.

Nakkawita said the ICC is exploring different ideas for creating teams. It will assign people to teams according to continents and world regions, such as the Middle East, or people will be assigned to teams at random.

Competition during the International Olympics will include soccer, volleyball, badminton, basketball, cricket and many board games. Prizes will also be awarded to winners of the events.

Nakkawita said the initial response from students has been positive about the Olympics.

Matt Mahoney, senior in business management, said he thinks American and international students will be excited to compete together.

"I think it's a great idea. The International Olympics would be a really fun way to meet some great people," Mahoney said.

The International Olympics will begin the second week of October. Finals will be during the weekend of Oct. 24-26.

More info?
Anyone with questions, ideas for other games or interested in entering the International Olympics can call Manuri Nakkawita at 776-2475, Nausheen Kazi at 565-9224, or the International Student Center at 532-6448. There is no deadline for entry.

Hurricane Nora set to pound Mexican Baja peninsula

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN QUINTIN, Mexico — Hurricane Nora headed for Mexico's central Baja California peninsula Wednesday bearing 85-mph winds and threatening to drench the southwestern United States.

Tuna fishing boats dashed for port, tourists started for home and a Mexico-bound cruise ship made an about-face as Nora was set to march over this stretch of land jutting into the Pacific Ocean south of California.

"Remnants of Nora will be hitting the United States sometime Friday," said Michael Formosa at the U.S. Hurricane Center in Miami, where radar screens showed a giant, whirling cloud mass churning toward land.

"Brace yourselves," he added, warning of up to 2 to 5 inches of rain, even 10 inches in some places.

The center said the storm would swiftly lose hurricane-strength while crossing Baja's mountainous backbone, then move across the Gulf of California into southwestern Arizona. When it reaches the border, it could still generate strong gusts at higher elevations.

At 8 p.m. EDT, Nora's eye was about 140 miles south of Punta Eugenia, a spur of land midway up the 800-mile-long west coast of Baja California. Nora was moving toward the north at about 15 mph and some weakening was forecast.

At its strongest, Nora had sustained winds of 125 mph after becoming a hurricane on Sept. 18. It caused no deaths, though 16-foot waves pounded hundreds of miles of the Mexico coastline, destroying dozens of homes and driving fishermen to port.

"Out there, storms hit you harder. But even here in port, who knows what will happen," said Isnardo Juarez, 39, who works on the 200-foot boat Lupe del Mar, which entered Ensenada, loaded with tuna.

Nora is the second hurricane to threaten Baja this month. Hurricane Linda set an eastern Pacific record with 220-mph sustained winds before defying forecasts and dying at sea.

No one was taking chances after Nora's front-line squalls washed out roads, felled trees and sent tourists to the bars of Cabos San Lucas, at Baja's extreme southern tip, earlier this week.

The storm also made life miserable for poor coastal dwellers, knocking down their cardboard houses and other rickety structures that served as shelter.

Arthur Jewell, a 69-year-old retired boilermaker from St. Helens, Ore., came down with his wife and granddaughter for sun and fun, but ended up leaving glum.

He said he has had six heart bypass operations and was feeling some discomfort unrelated to the storm.

"With the storm, I would just worry that much more. And that's bad," he said. "I rode out five typhoons when I was a (Navy) seaman in the Pacific and I don't ever want to be in another one."

Some farm hands planted cabbage, even as rain began falling and the sky darkened at midday.

"Supposedly there are strong winds coming, and they could hurt the crops. But what can you do?" foreman Noe

The Allocations Committee is providing representatives of College Council and the University Activities Board registered organizations with information on how to fund projects.

Gabe Eckert, junior in agricultural journalism and Allocations Committee chair, said the meetings are mandatory for any group that wants funding for projects.

The meetings are mandatory each year because group leaders change, and they might not be familiar with the funding process.

"Our goal is to provide groups with the knowledge and the tools to go through the allocation process to receive funds for their organizations," Eckert said.

Two of the remaining meetings are for University Activities Board-registered organizations and the College Council representatives.

The College Council will have a separate meeting because they have a different process. Eckert said the committee's philosophy is to become more user-friendly, and by separating the meetings it will simplify the process for all attending.

The workshops will give an overview of the allocation process, provide organizations with proper forms for funding, go over regulations of spending and answer any questions or concerns groups have with the allocations process.

Eckert said the allocations process can be complicated at times, and the workshop will be used to clarify the process.

Assisting Eckert is Jennyfer Owensby, accounting specialist for the Office of Student Activities and Services. Owensby is handling the technical questions group representatives have with the funding process.

Owensby said her role is to concentrate on questions about state regulations. She said if a group's funding request will be rejected, it will know why after the workshop.

"The main point of this is so they know how to spend their money," Owensby said.

Eckert said he expects almost 150 organizations to attend. He said only sports clubs and fine arts groups would be excused because they receive their funding from the Sports Club and Fine Arts Councils.

KGB general speaks about Soviet spy operations

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff reporter

A retired KGB general recalled the most dramatic moments of his life for an audience of nearly 100 people Wednesday as he told of discovering imperfections during his rise and fall within the Soviet secret police.

"When I entered this organization, I was fully aware of the Soviet regime, but not of all of its criminal activity," Oleg Kalugin said.

He said throughout his education, he was taught communism was the future of humanity.

Kalugin spoke at a joint presentation by the Department of Political Science and the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee at 2 p.m. Wednesday in the Union Little Theatre.

After an introduction and applause, Kalugin thanked the audience.

"I hope when I leave, it will be the same," he said.

Kalugin was the head of foreign counterintelligence in the KGB and directed Soviet spy operations in the United States during the Cold War.

"At that time, I was truly loyal and dedicated to the cause," he said.

Kalugin was born in Leningrad in 1934. He had family ties to the secret police: His father was an officer in the NKVD, the precursor of the KGB.

After graduating from Leningrad State University, Kalugin attended the Intelligence School in Moscow after being recruited by the KGB. From there he was sent to the United States, where he began his career conducting intelligence operations.

He went first to Columbia University in New York where he posed as a journalism student.

"I was not supposed to spy then," Kalugin said. "I was supposed to perfect my language and make friends, and then one day return to conduct my activities."

However, Kalugin said he did recruit people. His job was to penetrate America for the benefit of the Soviet society, he said.

After spending a year in New York, he worked as a correspondent for Moscow radio, and then he worked as a press officer at the Soviet Embassy in Washington, D.C.

It was then when Kalugin said he began to speak out against the KGB.

When Russia invaded Czechoslovakia, Kalugin was told he needed to inform the ambassador of the Area festival captures pioneer-era lifestyle

▶ What festival?
The Little Apple Festival will be from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. Saturday and 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Sunday. The events will occur at City Park, 1101 Fremont St.

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

Area residents will be given a chance to milk a goat, make a rope and see a joust without leaving Manhattan at this year's Little Apple Festival this weekend in City Park, said Ann Pavlik, recreation supervisor for Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation.

Kicking off fall is just one of the reasons parks and recreation sponsors the festival every year.

"It has become a popular event in the community and draws crowds of 10,000 people," Pavlik said. "It has become an event that the community looks forward to."

The festival is in its 22nd year and will open from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. Saturday and from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Sunday at City Park, located at 1101 Fremont St.

"Initially called the Flint Hills Festival, it involved more folk life than arts and crafts," Pavlik said. "It has evolved over the years to arts and crafts, folk-life entertainers and essentially, what it is today."

One of the main demonstrations of folk life will be the Mountain Man Camp, Pavlik said. Participants dress like pioneer trappers of the early 1800s and use tools and other implements that they would use in daily life.

The Society for Creative Anachronism will be performing jousting on foot and archery demonstrations, also as part of the folk-life entertainment. The participants will be dressed in costume and using replica artifacts.

The children's area has been greatly enlarged this year, said Tom Korte, fine arts specialist for parks and recreation and coordinator of the festival.

Korte said activities for the children will include pony rides, face painting, sand art, moonwalk, super play station

Manhattan Town Center celebrates 10 years with fund raiser

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

Considering the potential to raise $25,000 for the community and the Flint Hills Breadbasket, Manhattan Town Center announced plans Wednesday for its 10th anniversary gala.

"Manhattan Town Center looks toward partnerships in this community," said Monnie Applegate, marketing director for the mall. "We are truly a community center."

Celebrating 10 years of operation in October, the mall has plans to tie its celebration in with that of the 10th anniversary of the Mayor's Holiday Tree.

Tickets for the mall's anniversary ball will be sold for $50. The ball will last from 7 to 10:30 p.m. Oct. 24. A portion of the proceeds from the ticket sales will go to the Breadbasket. That donation will then be matched dollar for dollar by the McCormick Foundation.

"This is a great chance to bring together the Mayor's Holiday Tree and Manhattan Town Center to raise food and funds for the Breadbasket," Mayor Bruce Snead, said.

This year's goal is to raise 150,000 pounds of food for the Breadbasket. Many other organizations are taking part to meet the goal.

Cats for Cans is a K-State student-operated organization. Last year, Cats for Cans collected 75,000 pounds of food for the Breadbasket. That donation exceeded the previous year's by 25 percent, said Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Breadbasket.

"With the entire university working together, it's amazing what we can do," said Emily Emerson, junior in architectural engineering and chairwoman of the student organization.

Emerson said this year's campaign is already on its way with help from football coach Bill Snyder. A food drive will be part of the K-State football game on Nov. 15. Students can learn more about opportunities to donate this year by attending the organization's first meeting at 8 p.m. Tuesday, in Union 208.

"Hopefully, each organization will send one delegate to say that they can do the same things again this year," Emerson said.

Bramhall said a ribbon campaign that focuses on the theme "Hunger has a Cure" is under way. The harvest orange ribbons can be found at participating merchants and are worn to raise awareness and signify those experiencing hunger and malnutrition in the community.

"It signifies that you know hunger has a cure and you want to be a part of it," Bramhall said. "We want to raise awareness in the community."

Rich Seidler said he thinks the commitment to this community is still strong, seeing the dedication from the community, the mall and corporations.

"It's a day to day, month to month fight to stop hunger," Seidler said.

Police car damaged in accident; no injuries sustained by student

A K-State Police officer and K-State student were involved in an accident near Goodnow Hall at about 1 a.m. Sept. 18.

No injuries were reported and no tickets were issued.

According to a Riley County Police Department report, Wesley Owens, sophomore in architectural engineering, ran into a campus police car while chasing after a Hackey-Sack ball in the parking lot in front of Goodnow.

The police car, driven by Glenn Brown, was goingnorthwest in the parking lot at about 5 mph when Owens hit the side of the car.

K-State student Mike Pfannenstiel had been playing Hackey-Sack with Owens and witnessed the accident.

"He ran into the car and caught his elbow on the windshield," Pfannenstiel said.

Significant damage was done to the windshield and a side mirror on the police car.

Judge dismisses charges against epileptic man convicted of assault

ARLINGTON, Va. — A man with epilepsy who was convicted of assault for grabbing a woman's arm during a seizure has been cleared after convincing a judge that he wasn't in control of himself.

Scott D. Vining was found guilty in July after he grabbed the woman on a commuter train in the Washington, D.C., suburbs and refused to let go. A third passenger intervened.

On Tuesday, when he had been scheduled to be sentenced, Arlington County Judge Griffin T. Garnett Jr. dismissed the verdict after seeing videotapes of Vining having seizures, including some in which he lunged at people.

The tapes were shot over six days at George Washington University Hospital. Vining voluntarily stopped taking his medication to prove that his epilepsy could cause the behavior he exhibited on May 19.

In finding Vining guilty, Garnett had discounted a letter from a doctor and testimony about his seizures.

Vining, 35, had faced up to a year in jail and a $2,500 fine.

Marine receives bad-conduct discharge for war desertion

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif. — A 48-year-old Marine who fled to Canada when his unit was ordered to duty in Vietnam 29 years ago has received a bad-conduct discharge for desertion.

Pvt. Randall J. Caudill, who could have been sentenced Tuesday to three years' confinement, was expected to be released by the weekend, Staff Sgt. Janice Hagar said.

At 19, Caudill was disenchanted with the Marine Corps and believed he and his fellow corpsmen were not properly trained to fight when his Camp Pendleton unit was ordered to Vietnam.

But prosecutor Maj. John Scott said at the general court-martial hearing that a dishonorable discharge would have been appropriate punishment.

Caudill was arrested Sept. 9 at the U.S.-Canada border when U.S. immigration officials conducting a random sweep aboard a ferry from Canada discovered he was still listed as a deserter.

Amnesty was granted to Vietnam-era draft dodgers who fled to Canada, but not to deserters.

Man given sentence of 61 years in attempted murder case

TOPEKA — Roy Dudley would have gotten a lighter sentence if he had actually killed his girlfriend, his lawyer said after Dudley was sentenced to 61 years on an attempted murder charge.

A repeat offender convicted of attempted second-degree murder for the 1996 shooting of his former girlfriend, Dudley, 36, was sentenced Tuesday to the mandatory term based on Kansas sentencing guidelines.

District Judge Eric Rosen sentenced Dudley to 61 years for the attempted second-degree murder of Marie Reynolds, 12 years and 10 months for the intentional aggravated battery of Reynolds and one year and seven months for criminal possession of a firearm. The latter terms are to run at the same time.

For a conviction of premeditated first-degree murder in Kansas, state law imposes a life sentence with parole eligibility after 25 years and 15 years for felony first-degree murder. Kansas also has a Hard 40 sentence, which means convicts must serve 40 years in prison before becoming eligible for parole.

Practice session

Restaurant management student gains experience for future career

MATT KREPS
staff writer

Marcus Cooper is getting an education in the classroom and on the job.

Cooper, a sophomore in hotel and restaurant management, is a full-time student and works at Arby's Roast Beef Restaurant to gain experience.

"This is what I'm going to spend the rest of my life doing. I want to be here," Cooper said.

Cooper said he started in communications because he enjoys interacting with people. He said he soon realized he really wanted to work in restaurant management and switched programs.

Cooper's plans include opening his own restaurant in Manhattan.

"I want a restaurant. I know that," he said.

His time at Arby's is a practice session. He said he can try new ideas and gain experience relating to people while he earns money to pay for his education.

"You can't wait until you get your degree to do this," he said. "I've learned how to deal with people, and I'm still learning how to deal with people. You have to practice."

Cooper said he believes communication and atmosphere are the keys to a successful business.

Another part of communication is knowing the customer's needs without talking. Cooper said body language and facial expressions are important signs in determining how he relates to a customer.

"My main focus is on the customer. I want to create an atmosphere so when you come in here, you enjoy yourself," Cooper said. "I want people to come here to have fun."

Cooper also has fun interacting with his customers. He wrote a song to the tune of Walt Disney's "Be Our Guest" that incorporates items from the menu. He also jokes with regulars or people who are in the mood for some fun.

His restaurant plans are for a small chain starting in Manhattan. It would be a fast-food type serving hoagies, Philly cheese steaks, grilled sausages, vegetarian and experimental menus.

Another thing Cooper's restaurants would serve is character. Cooper said he wants to let people suggest menu items, provide amateur music and comedy, and let students help design and run the business.

Cooper said there is talent in Manhattan that he would like to tap. He wants to use designers from the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, managers from hotel and restaurant management and many others to help make his business a success.

"I got a network, and that's the whole key. I got a network," Cooper said.

Cooper is the first in his family to attend college. He said it is not easy to take classes and work, but he said he will succeed and believes school is important to success.

"I was born and bred in Philly. And I thought we were middle-class when I was growing up, but we weren't. Man, we were seriously poor," he said.

Cooper said he is not the smartest person, but he plans to follow the example of former Philadelphia Mayor Frank Rizzo and surround himself with smart people.

"No man is an island. You can't do it without the team," he said.

Another inspiration in Cooper's decision to go back to school was President Jon Wefald. When Wefald first came to K-State, Cooper was working as a janitor after serving in the military.

Cooper said the time that Wefald took to address all the staff and that Wefald remembered Cooper's name when they met later impressed him.

"I respect the man a whole bunch," Cooper said.

Even with the inspiration and dreams of the future, Cooper said it is difficult to keep going.

"Is it easy? No. But I'm still here. I'm still going. A little slow, but I'm still going," he said.

Health insurance plan may be more expensive

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff reporter

Student health services provided through Lafene Health Center have stabilized again. The question now is whether it will stay that way.

Members of the Student Health Advisory Committee said only 301 students are enrolled in Lafene's student health insurance program provided by G-M Underwriters.

The enrollment is down from more than 500 students last year. With the enrollment so low, it is possible the student health insurance plan's premiums will go up, said Fred Newton, director of University Counseling Services.

Troy Brin, a SHAC committee member, said the health insurance plan may not be able to afford its contract with Lafene if enrollment remains low.

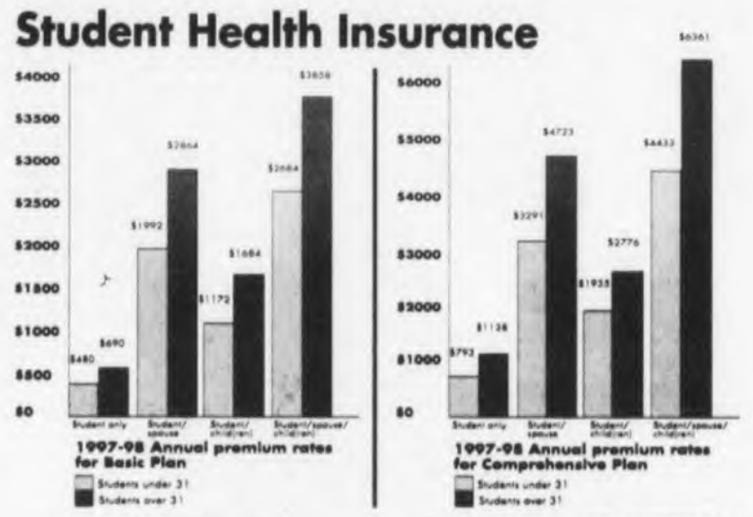
"It's going to set back the insurance company if we don't get an enrollment of around 500 students," Brin said. "We signed a contract based on last year's enrollment figure, and if we can't reach that figure the insurance company will have to make a decision."

The decision could leave Lafene without a student health insurance program, Newton said. The other option would be for premiums in the insurance program to increase.

"Students still have until Sept. 30 to enroll," Newton said. "We couldn't see students at enrollment, since enrollment wasn't at Ahearn. That may be why our numbers our down."

After earlier budget cuts resulting in cutbacks in availability and accessibility of services, the health care needs are now being met. In the past several years, attention has been placed upon more effective use of resources in an attempt to hold down costs of providing services.

Brin said he believes Lafene has done a tremendous job of keeping costs low for students.



"They have actually lowered the health fee from a couple of years ago. That's impressive, since health care costs are sky-rocketing," Brin said.

Strategies instituted to contain costs include reductions in clinic hours and emphasizing patient's appointments.

Lafene has also screened patients so lesser illnesses and injuries are cared for by health-care staff other than doctors. Lannie Zweimiller, Lafene director, said this frees up more expensive physician time.

"They have dealt with inflation as well," Brin said. "They really work with what they are given."

OPINION

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1997

OURview

Our View, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. The editorial board consists of Collegian editors and other staff members. Our view is the Collegian's official opinion.

Students should take time to voice campus concerns today

Angry about the lack of parking on the campus?

Curious about the cut in periodicals?

Just plain curious about campus?

Mortar Board understands and wants to give students and faculty the chance to have all their questions answered.

At noon today, the community service senior honorary will gather the people best able to answer these questions and more in the Union Courtyard and hand over the microphone to you so you can ask anything you want.

Anything.

Present at the panel will be Pat Bosco, dean of student life; Robert Krause, vice president for Institutional Advancement; Larry Moeder, director of Student Financial Services; Tracey Fraser, director of Career and Employment Services; Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services; and Tim Riemann, student body president.

Everything you ever wanted to know about the state of the campus can be answered, and any concern you have ever wanted to be voiced can be heard and addressed by the right people.

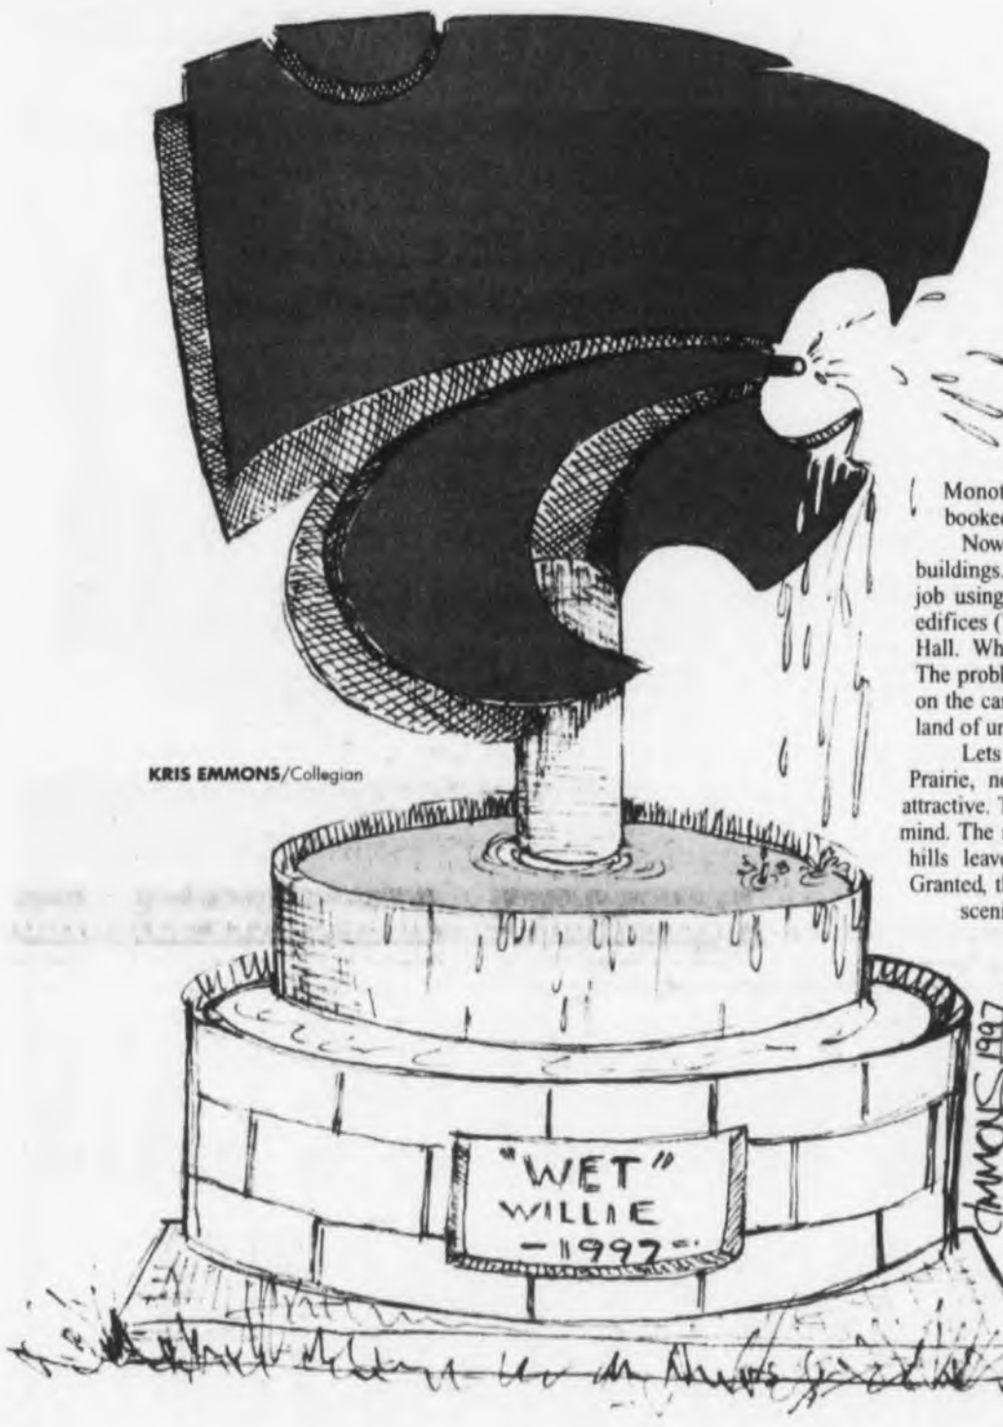
Don't miss this chance.

The head honchos of K-State have given up one hour of their time to come listen to your questions and concerns. Make that hour count. It's an opportunity you most likely don't get every day.

Think about the questions you want answered. Think about all the good ideas you have to fix the problems of this campus. Be there to listen to answers about things you have never even thought of yourself. Above all, just be there.

In previous years, students and faculty have heard the straight facts about the proposed parking garage, restaurants in the K-State Student Union and the expansion of the Library, all straight from those in the know.

The information available at this discussion panel is invaluable in the long run.



Since most of us can't just walk into the Director of Parking Service's office and yell about our latest parking ticket, this chance is a golden opportunity.

And who knows? Maybe it is your question or comment that will get some important changes on campus made. You could be hailed as a hero and be carried through the Union on the shoulders of the entire student body.

You never know.

SIGHT FOR SORE EYES

Lack of campus art makes walking to class a monotonous experience

I find myself using the phrase "sight for sore eyes" far too often. Why such ocular discomforts? Take a look at our campus. If K-State were music, it would be a Yanni song. Monotone, boring and regularly booked to play the Acropolis.

Now, I'm not berating the campus buildings. The university has done a fine job using limestone to create pleasing edifices (With the exception of Denison Hall. What the hell happened there?) The problem lies in the lack of artwork on the campus. Our campus is a wasteland of undecorated fescue.

Lets face it – aside from the Konza Prairie, northern Kansas isn't all that attractive. The phrase butt-ugly comes to mind. The mundane nature of the rolling hills leaves something to be desired. Granted, the Flint Hills are a wonderful scenic slice of mid-America, but that stretch of gorgeous pasture does not extend all the way to K-State. We must provide beauty.

Schools like South West Texas State University have naturally beautiful campuses. A moat surrounds their theater, a lake runs between buildings and their landscaping is top-notch. Seeing as how K-State lacks all of these attributes, we are left with two options for school beautification. Either we put a moat around Nichols Hall, or we provide the campus with more art.

I support the latter.

Attempts at beautification have apparently been tried and are occasionally encountered on campus. However, these displays are not as attractive or widespread as they could be. Current works of genius include the huge fork outside King Hall. Incredibly thought-provoking, to say the least.

The next step is to place a spoon outside of Durland Hall just to complete the cutlery set. I hear they're breaking out the fine china for Family Weekend.

The works on the west side of the Memorial Stadium are nice, but hidden. I hardly walk in that area of campus because it is secluded, and because I fear being crushed by a falling rappeller. Several other pieces of art dot the campus lawns but are not numerous enough to create a fulfilling experience.

Wichita State University has come to terms with its inherently homely surroundings. Their solution? They have amassed the largest collection of sculptures and statues in the nation outside of UCLA. Their campus is a maze of artistic encounters. You can't walk 10 feet without running into a bust or a sculpture. Walking to class becomes a joy when you can view any number of nude women cast in bronze or copper.

This type of commitment on the part of the administration and student body has certainly added to the overall welfare of the school.

As it is now, all of the promotions for K-State are plastered with photos of Anderson Hall because it is the only recognizable item on our campus.

Art would give the campus an identity and a selling point. Chicago has Buckingham Fountain, St. Louis has the arch, and hell, my mom still has the plaster imprint of my hand from the fourth grade. These artifacts provide the respective owners with an identity. By adding art we can add character and identity to an otherwise nondescript campus.

Including more art on campus would also give local artists an outlet for showing their works. The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art will not show student work, and other galleries are limited and inconvenient.

The location in Willard Gallery just seems silly. I have never walked out of my chemistry lecture with an overwhelming hankering to view paintings.

Further, the K-State Student Union art gallery has very limited space. The great outdoors provide unlimited locations for art, space that is being neglected.

A large bronze Willie spitting water from his mouth and placed in or around the free-speech zone would serve as a rallying point for all students. It would promote school pride, provide an aesthetic influence and offer solace from the hot August sun.

The placement of the art department's nude models on platforms around campus would surely elevate the status of the university. Of course, these are just suggestions for a better campus. I urge you, the reader, to develop your own ideas on the state of the art at K-State.

While the mood has been jocular, the issue at hand is an important one. Art and artists deserve a place on our campus. The benefits extend beyond the artist to the students, the administration and the university as well.

Hopefully, in the future, we can have a campus that is filled with artistic expressions. This addition will ensure that our "sight for sore eyes" becomes a sight of beauty, distinction and prestige.

Action needed to clean up money in politics

Recent problems with campaign contributions raise questions of reform.

NANCY KASSEBAUM-BAKER AND WALTER F. MONDALE

Baker

Mondale

In 1996, our already-weak system of federal campaign finance regulation finally collapsed. Both the Democratic and Republican parties raised unprecedented amounts of cash, including contributions of $50,000 or $100,000 or more from corporations, unions and wealthy individuals.

These enormous gifts of "soft money," money given outside the bounds of federal election law, have become the subject of congressional and other investigations. They have also inspired efforts for overdue reform of our campaign finance laws.

We believe the influence of big money can — and must — be controlled. And we are convinced that Congress should act now without further delay.

This summer, former Presidents Bush, Carter and Ford called upon Congress to promptly begin the task of reform, starting with an end to these huge soft money contributions. They also urged the complete and rapid public disclosure of political contributions and expenditures, as well as independent and effective enforcement of campaign finance laws.

Federal law places strict limits on the monies parties may raise for presidential and congressional elections. These limits come from a long tradition of reform seeking to protect the integrity of our national government from corrupting the influence of money.

Corporate contributions to federal campaigns were first banned at the beginning of the century. The ban was extended to union contributions during World War II.

Following the Watergate scandal of the early 1970s, Congress added limits on federal election contributions by individuals.

These restraints are still on the books. But they seem to have become works of fiction, as loopholes have permitted big money to flow once again into our political process. Like cracks in dikes, the first exception to limits on "hard money" — funds raised or spent expressly to campaign for particular candidates — were small, paying for general activities, like getting out the vote.

By 1996, the soft money exception had devoured the system, contributing to a media war between parties that pretended to be educational about general "issues," but in truth was about the forthcoming election.

All told, the national parties used the soft money loophole to raise and spend a record smashing $250 million for the 1996 elections.

The number of dollars going into politics has declined sharply — 1996 being the lowest turnout for a presidential election in 70 years. This trend may have multiple causes, but the coincidence is disturbing.

The Supreme Court has upheld the power of Congress to bar corporate and union contributions, and limit individual contributions, to avoid corruption or the appearance thereof. When these restraints are flicked aside in the money rush, it is not surprising if citizens lose confidence that their small contributions, and even voters, count for very much. A soft money ban is needed to reaffirm that votes, not dollars, are the true underpinning of our democracy.

A soft money ban will not remedy all abuses. Lots of cash spent in the last election did not even show up as campaign contributions. In weeks before the election, groups with obscure names paid for media blitzes that wrapped candidate attacks or endorsements in the disguise of "issue advocacy" discussions. These groups were not required to disclose their funding sources prior to the election, nor were they subject to contribution limits.

We have joined others in urging that Congress amend the campaign finance law to keep pace with new campaign techniques. All election participants — candidates and independent groups alike — should play by comparable rules and in the sunshine of public view.

Other proposed changes merit debate in Congress this fall. But as important as additional reforms may be, disagreement about them should not delay a vote this year to close down the corrosive soft money system.

Because complete reform is not likely to occur all at once, we will continue to face challenges that define our democracy for years to come.

Our candidates are overwhelmed by the demands of fund raising. Those who already hold office spend decreasing time on public responsibilities as they spend increasing time on fundraising.

Campaign costs are driven in large part by the media costs of reaching out to a nation whose citizens long ago ceased to debate politics in village halls and no longer read newspapers as they used to.

Money in politics is a matter of concern for university and college communities. In responding to the challenges ahead, answers that give vitality to our constitutional traditions and renew public trust in government will be indispensable to our democracy.

They will come sooner if illuminated by study in centers of scholarship. They will also require the persistent effort of a new generation of voters who are determined to insist on the integrity of their government and its electoral process.

TAMEL SISNEY, sophomore in arts and sciences, expresses his views Tuesday night at Black Student Union's discussion on hip-hop culture.

Survival of hip-hop dependent on unity

LESLEY BAKER
staff reporter

Written on a board in black and fading orange marker were the words soul, language, fashion/style, expression, rhythm, message, unity and rap music.

The Black Student Union was host to a discussion on the survival of hip-hop culture Tuesday.

"Everything we have up here is expression," Jawwad Abdulhaqq, senior in political science, said. "Hip-hop has its own message. This is what's going to be the survival of hip-hop — unity."

Among the ideas discussed was the effect of music on this generation.

"Hip-hop, it affects our everyday choice," Abdulhaqq said. "For our generation, it's the only thing we got that defines us. Just like Afros and bell-bottoms defined those before us."

Antoinette Wells, sophomore in psychology, said she prefers to listen to music she can identify with.

"I don't like country music," Wells said. "I can't relate to getting on my horse and riding it away. If someone's being shot in the head, I can relate to that. We were there."

Other comments centered around music evoking behavior. One example used was that of a hypothetical preacher who listens to gospel music all day, then hears one song that makes him molest a little girl.

"I don't believe that someone could listen to a song and go off like that," Abdulhaqq said. "I think it's the violence of society. This is what hip-hop means to me. Hip-hop equals power. Another side of hip-hop is bringing our elders up to snuff."

Topics ranged from the discussion and effects of hip-hop to the hip-hop idols who have made it big and given nothing back to their community.

"You got hip-hop touching the lives of kids in China, Africa," Abdulhaqq said. "It started in New York. If God gave me the strength to get up every morning, I'm going to give something back with my own hands. You got the whole world looking at us, black men in the "hood especially."

The meeting ended with Abdulhaqq inviting participants to stand up and give a public commitment about how they will help their communities after they've become successful.

"I got the idea from Essence magazine," Colette McLemore, senior in social sciences and president of BSU, said. "It's all over, black and hip-hop."

Abdulhaqq said the discussion was an opportunity for students to discuss issues about culture.

"The goal was to give people food for thought," Abdulhaqq said. "To put something in people's minds. That's the goal."

Theater offers cheap movies, rich history

LANCE SCHOEN
staff reporter

It started when Harry Miller built a theater off the corner of campus more than 70 years ago.

The Campus Theatre, in Aggieville, opened its doors on May 1, 1926. It has operated ever since.

Dan Walter, Aggieville Business Association historian and former employee of the Campus Theatre, said the theater has had many different names.

"The name was changed to the Varsity Theatre in 1931. In 1935 the name was changed to the Sosna Theatre, and then to the Campus Theatre in 1951," Walter said.

Walter wrote a book about the history of Aggieville titled "Aggieville 1889-1989, 100 Years of Aggieville Tradition." He is now writing another book about Aggieville called "Aggieville Memories," which he hopes to complete later this year.

"The first movie shown was 'Paris at Midnight.' They also had an orchestra and an original Felix the Cat cartoon," he said.

Admission for the opening show was 10 cents and 40 cents. Walter said he didn't know why there was a discrepancy in price.

In the earliest years, the theater offered a cry room for mothers with babies and a smoking room for men, Walter said.

The theater is now owned by Carmike Cinema, which bought out the previous owner in June, said Jeff Barns, Carmike Cinema Seth Child Cinema employee.

Barns said Campus Theatre offers good movies for discounted prices, because it only shows second-run shows. These are movies released a couple of months before they show at the Campus Theatre.

Just because the movies are second-run doesn't mean they are bottom-of-the-barrel flicks, Walter said.

Movies including "Batman and Robin," "Breakdown," "Anaconda" and "Liar, Liar" have all had their showings on the Campus Theatre's silver screen.

Gender of firstborn possibly linked to age gaps

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Men who want a son might do well to marry a younger woman, while women who want a daughter might look for a younger man, a study suggests.

The results are certainly not guaranteed. But the research suggests that the age gap really can affect what sex a firstborn child will be.

In a group of 301 British families, researchers found that when men married women at least five years younger than they, the firstborn sons outnumbered daughters nearly 2-to-1. And when women married younger men, the result favored baby girls by about 2-to-1.

A bigger sample, covering England and Wales, showed further evidence of the trend.

How can this be? Biologically it's a mystery, says study author John Manning of the University of Liverpool in England. Manning, an evolutionary biologist, reports the work with two students in today's issue of the journal Nature.

Experts in fertility and demography were cautious and said it's not clear whether the finding would apply to people in general.

"What we have is an observation without an explanation," said J. Richard Udry, a professor at the Carolina Population Center at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. "It's provocative."

The work joins a list of studies that suggest the ratio of newborn boys to girls can be influenced by things such as the ages of either parent, their social status, the mother's personality and societal stresses like war. The area of study has long been controversial, in part

Preparing for the Cats

Bowling Green Falcons coach Gary Blackney taking Cats seriously

JESS C. LOUK
staff writer

> We like to run the ball, we have to move the ball in some form offensively, and I'm not sure if we can do that. We have a tremendous amount of respect for the K-State defense.

> • Gary Blackney
> Bowling Green head coach

The Bowling Green Falcons might play in the Mid-American Conference, but that doesn't mean they don't play ranked opponents. And it doesn't mean K-State is overlooking them.

"If we overlook Bowling Green, that will be the biggest mistake of the season," quarterback Michael Bishop said.

This week, the Falcons take on the No. 17 Wildcats. But hold on. The Cats are not the highest-ranked opponent Bowling Green has played in its fledgling season.

Bowling Green played No. 6 Ohio State in its third game of the season and was pounded 44-13. The Cats will get a measurement of how they stand in comparison with the other top 20 teams when they play the Falcons this Saturday at KSU Stadium.

For Bowling Green's part, Coach Gary Blackney said his team is taking the upcoming game against K-State seriously.

"I would compare them to Ohio State. They are one of the best teams in the country," Blackney said. "They are obviously a team that plays above the MAC conference."

This season, K-State is 2-0 against its MAC conference opponents. The Cats won 47-7 against Northern Illinois in a convincing fashion.

But the game against Ohio was significantly less impressive. In that game, the Cats escaped with a narrow 23-20 win over a MAC team that boasts an undefeated conference record and is 3-1 overall.

"We have to throw the Ohio game out, as far as preparing for Kansas State," Blackney said. "Ohio runs a rare slant defense, and offensively they do some things with their personnel that we don't."

Bowling Green lines up on the ball more conventionally than Ohio. The Falcons run a three-four defensive front with primarily zone coverage. On the offensive side of the ball, they run a pro-set offense out of the I formation.

"If we run 70 plays, we want to run 45 times and pass 25 times," Blackney said. "That is the way our offense defines balance."

For the Falcons to come into KSU Stadium and walk away with an upset victory, Blackney said they would have to stop the K-State running game and not give up big plays. On special teams, the Falcons would have to play at a higher level they have all year. Offensively, they're just hoping to move the ball.

"We like to run the ball," Blackney said. "We have to move the ball in some form offensively, and I'm not sure if we can do that. We have a tremendous amount of respect for the K-State defense."

At this point, Blackney said he is uncertain as to who will assume the starting quarterback position Saturday. In the Falcons' game against Akron last week, starting quarterback Bob Niemet suffered a concussion late in the second half, and was forced to leave the game.

Backup quarterback and redshirt freshman Ricky Schneider entered the game and led the Falcons to four scoring drives in the second half. Schneider completed 12-of-17 passes for 122 yards in the second half.

But Schneider's biggest play came late in the fourth quarter when he engineered the team's final game-winning drive.

Blackney said Schneider's play hasn't led to a quarterback controversy. Niemet has been cleared to play, but Blackney is concerned about having the injury recur and losing him for a larger amount of the season.

The Falcons are 1-4 lifetime against Big 12 opponents, with their only victory coming against Missouri in 1995.

Their less-than-impressive record against the Big 12 isn't stopping Blackney from saying his team is a contender in the MAC.

"If we stay healthy, we fully expect to contend for the conference championship," Blackney said. "We expect to win it."

By all indications, so does Ohio.

Top-10 list attempts to breathe new life into TV baseball

Well, football is here and the agonizingly long baseball regular season is finally drawing to a close.

It's not that I don't like baseball. Really, it's not.

I loved playing it while growing up, and there's nothing better than sitting in the stands of a major-league stadium on a warm summer night. The only problem is that baseball is incredibly boring to watch on television.

As a matter of fact, there were times this summer that I had a difficult time deciding between Wednesday night baseball on ESPN and reruns of "Dr. Quinn, Medicine Woman."

Sometimes Dr. Quinn won out. Hey, she's no "Xena: Warrior Princess," but she's kind of cute.

I'm not exactly sure what makes watching a game on television so boring.

Maybe it's the commercials after every half inning or the fact that the major-league teams play so many games every season that one game doesn't really matter that much. Or maybe the games just last too darn long.

Whatever the case, it's not very often that I can sit through a full game. I will try to catch a few games during the playoffs, but that's just because of the tradition.

Anyway, in order to do my part to improve major-league baseball, I've decided to devise the top-10 ways to make baseball games more exciting to watch.

VIEWPOINT

CRESTON KUENZI

CRESTON KUENZI is a junior in computer engineering. You can send your e-mail to Creston at creston@ksu.edu

10. Replace the warning track with a giant trampoline.

I know this is straight out of an All-Sport drink commercial, but with the addition of a trampoline, there's sure to be more home run-robbing catches.

9. Replace the seventh-inning stretch with the seventh-inning shot.

It's time to make baseball more appealing to the college crowd. After downing a few shots, the games would certainly seem more exciting to the normally docile baseball crowds, thus causing them to be more rambunctious.

As an added bonus, there would be cool names like the "McGwire Mash," the "Belle Blast" and the "Griffey Gravy."

OK, so maybe this would take away from the family atmosphere, but you've got to sacrifice something.

8. Mandatory "no slide" rule at home.

There's nothing more exhilarating than a collision at home plate, so why not make it required?

7. Cheerleaders.

6. More drunken commentators

5. Replace beer and hot dog vendors with the staff from Hooters.

Or, for you ladies out there, the Chippendale dancers.

4. Install a pitch clock to speed up the game

I'm serious about this one. Games last too long.

3. Shut off the stadium lights and play one inning with glow-in-the-dark balls, gloves and plates.

2. One lucky fan gets to give the losing pitcher a wedgie!

1. Seven words: "That's good for another Royals base hit!"

To all of you baseball purists, I'm sure these changes sound a little drastic, but I look at it like this: In the past few years, we've seen the cancellation of a World Series, the adoption of a playoff system and the addition of interleague play. So what's a few more minor changes going to hurt?

Freshman runners lead Cats cross country team

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

A youth movement has taken over the K-State cross country team as freshmen Brandon Jessop and Annie Wetterhus have led the men's and women's teams through the season thus far.

On Saturday, head coach Randy Cole expects Jessop and Wetterhus to lead the Wildcats' pack in the Roy Griak Invitational at Minneapolis, Minn.

> ▶ Look it up in the eCollegian archives.
> The eCollegian is keeping an archive of cross country stories. For a preview of the season go to collegian.ksu.edu/issues/v102/fa/preview/sports/precrosscountry-hertig.html.

The Invitational, which is one of the largest cross country meets in the nation, will have competitors from all parts of the country. Providence, Oregon and Wisconsin are expected to have some of the strongest teams in the field.

Cole said he isn't worried about throwing freshmen Jessop and Wetterhus into the mix. "I see them both as being national-caliber runners," he said.

Jessop said he has set an enormous goal for himself in the invitational.

"I plan to get into the top 15, and I think the way my training is going right now that's realistic, but it's going to be really hard," he said.

"In order to place in the top 15, what I'll try to do is for the first 3K I'll be conservative," he said. "Then as the race goes on, as coach says, I'll get more hungry."

Wetterhus has set a more modest goal for herself this week.

"I'm just going to try to stay up there with the pack," she said. "Hopefully Kelly Andra will be up there to help me."

In the Jayhawk Invitational two weeks ago, Jessop and Wetterhus were the top K-State finishers in the men's and women's divisions.

Jessop placed 17th out of 120 runners in the 8,000-meter course with a time of 27 minutes, eight seconds.

"Getting into the top 20 is quite an accomplishment for a freshman," Cole said.

In the women's 5000-meter course, Wetterhus placed fourth overall with a time of 19:03. She placed third out of the collegiate runners in the field, but an unattached runner also placed ahead of her.

During her days at Morton High School in Morton, Ill., Wetterhus was a class AA track state champion in the 3,200-meter run. She also became a high school honorable mention all-American in cross country with her 10th-place finish at the Midwest Region Foot Locker Cross Country Champion-ships.

"Annie has a good background in distance running," Cole said. "She's not afraid to compete."

Jessop had an illustrious career at Kearney High School in Kearney, Neb. He compiled 19 state championship medals in cross country and track, 17 of which were gold. He nearly qualified for the Foot Locker National Cross Country Championship placing ninth in the 266-runner field of the Midwest Region. The top eight finishers moved on to the national championship.

Perhaps the most outstanding achievement of Jessop's career was when his 4 by 800-meter relay team ran a time of 7:45.03, the fastest time in the nation.

In light of his accomplishments, Jessop said he realizes that college cross country has a much higher level of competition than high school.

"I think there's a big step you have to take from being a good high school runner to being an average college runner," he said. "I'm an aggressive runner, but I know that winning a race right now as a freshman is not even a dream."

Tennis players prepare for Clay Courts in Orlando

JOEL WHITE
staff writer

Winning without team chemistry is tough.

When the K-State doubles team of Eva Novotna and Yana Dorodnova clash with some of the nation's top collegiate tennis players in the International Tennis Association's National Clay Courts next Tuesday in Orlando, Fla., its chemistry will make or break it.

In their first tournament together, last week's Travelers Express Invitational, Novotna and Dorodnova won by knocking off Sandra Noetzel and Lisa Hart of Nebraska in the championship match.

Although they played well together, head coach Steve Bietau said they haven't had enough time to jell.

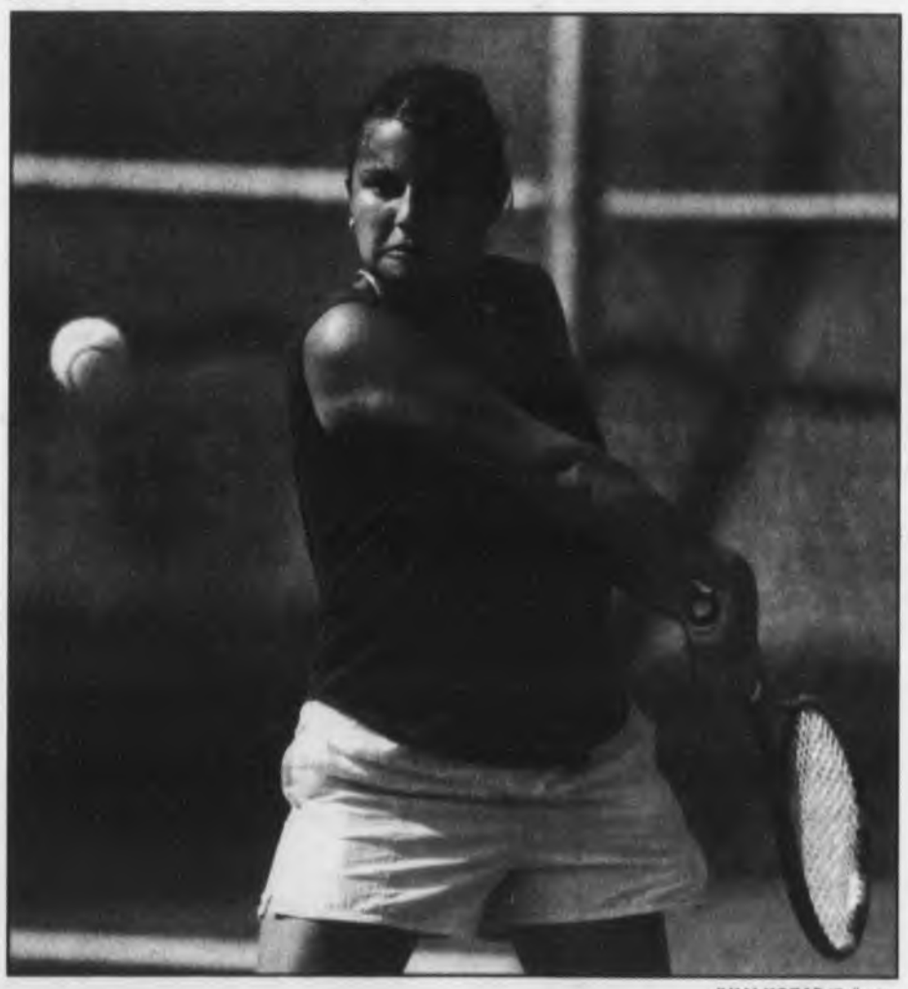
"I was impressed with the growth and what they were able to accomplish," he said, "but the chemistry between those two players will take time to develop."

Bietau said the tournament victory was an indication of the effectiveness of their contrasting styles.

"I like players that complement each other," Bietau said. "Yana is powerful, she serves well and it's tough to get a ball past her at the net," he said. "Eva is quick and capable of returning consistently."

Novotna and Dorodnova have contrasting styles of play, but they share at least one characteristic: Both have a history of being successful on the court.

A freshman from Paradubice, Czech Republic, Novotna has only been in the United States for a month. In the past year, she played for the LTC Paradubice tennis club and was the 15th ranked 18-and-under player in the Czech Republic.



Dorodnova, a senior from Moscow, was named to last season's first-team all-Big 12 team in singles and doubles competition. She was also a key member of K-State's first tennis team to qualify for the NCAA national tournament in 1996.

The ITA National Clay Courts is the first leg of the collegiate Grand Slam of tennis and is also the only tournament played on clay courts in which Novotna and Dorodnova will compete. They will start the doubles competition on Tuesday in the qualifying round. Each player is also in the singles' draw of the tournament.

The other three legs of the Grand Slam are the Riviera All American, the Rolex Regional Championships, both in the fall, and the NCAA championships in the spring.

Bietau said the favorites of the 144-player field of the ITA National Clay Courts "would be difficult to pinpoint at this time."

"You can count on it being an extremely strong field."

IVAN KOZAR/Collegian

ANNA PAMPOULOVA of the K-State tennis team practices at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Novotna has played on clay courts often during her tennis career. Bietau said her experience on clay will be an advantage.

"She's a little more comfortable on the clay," he said. "From that standpoint, it's a plus."

However, Bietau said her experience on clay will not make the tournament any easier.

"Many of them will be in the same situation," he said. "There are plenty of players in there who have experience on clay."

Beginning with the pre-qualifying singles round on Saturday, Novotna must win two matches to advance to the qualifying round. From there, she must defeat two more players to advance into the main draw.

For her to place first in the tournament, she must win 10 matches in a row.

As one of the most competitive tournaments of the season, Bietau said, "The deeper you get in the field, the harder the tournament gets."

Dorodnova will start singles play Tuesday in the qualifying round. She must win eight consecutive matches to win the championship.

Summing up the harshness of the ITA National Clay Courts, Bietau said, "This week, if you lose, you go home."

European allies seek commitment to keep U.S. soldiers in Balkans

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — European allies, buoyed by a Clinton administration pledge not to "cut and run" from peacemaking in Bosnia, sought a firm commitment Wednesday that U.S. troops would remain in the region beyond a scheduled withdrawal next June.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's meetings with British, French, German and Russian diplomats were eased by a declaration by President Clinton's assistant for national security affairs, Sandy Berger, that the allies must be prepared for an extended stay.

The Europeans had stated before Berger's speech Tuesday at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., that they would not permit their peacekeepers to remain if the Americans withdrew.

Until Clinton sent in U.S. troops, Europeans carried the brunt of the peacemaking burden — and bore the casualties.

The administration, on the other hand, has come under pressure from several members of Congress to keep Clinton's promise to bring the 8,500 U.S. troops home by the end of June.

Defense Secretary William Cohen, skeptical of U.S. involvement while in the Senate, said in March that he thought that the United States will be "on their way out" during June 1998.

But even while claiming that American and European diplomats, backed by the NATO peacekeeping force, were overcoming ethnic tensions in Bosnia-Herzegovina and gaining compliance with the 1995 Dayton peace accords, Clinton, Albright and Berger gradually have become convinced the job cannot be concluded by June.

Tuesday, Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, predicted a vigorous fight in Congress to block any new commitment of American forces. "We're not looking at Somalia," she said. "We're looking at Vietnam. They don't have a clear-cut strategy."

On this, Richard Holbrooke, key architect of the Dayton accords, sharply disagreed.

"There is a confusion in some people's minds between an exit strategy and a date certain for withdrawal," he said in an interview. "We do need an exit strategy."

He explained there must be a plan to withdraw safely at the right time. But that time, he suggested, is sometime beyond June, and it was a mistake to compare the Bosnia peacekeeping mission to Vietnam or to Somalia.

In Vietnam, Holbrooke said, "We were losing 300 to 400 Americans killed a week. In Bosnia — zero."

In fact, he said, "nobody has been injured by hostile forces."

In Somalia, 18 U.S. Rangers were killed after being lured into an ambush. "This is not the way our forces are structured in Bosnia," he said. "They are respected and feared."

Holbrooke, a part-time mediator for the administration on the Cyprus dispute, is also assisting in Bosnia diplomacy.

As the European allies sought assurances of a follow-on force to remain in Bosnia after June, a senior U.S. official said "everyone knows there has to be such a force" and that the terms eventually will have to be negotiated with Congress.

"Peace is beginning to take root," Berger said in his speech. "The gains are not irreversible, and locking them in will require that the international community stay engaged in Bosnia in some fashion for a good while to come."

Like Clinton and other U.S. foreign policy and defense leaders, Berger was careful to say the present NATO mission to stabilize the former Yugoslav republic ends in June.

K-State Habitat for Humanity gives money to Manhattan chapter for construction fund

JOHN HENDERSON
senior writer

The K-State chapter of Habitat for Humanity pledged $8,000 of its $8,665 budget to the Manhattan Habitat for Humanity affiliate to help fund a housing construction project that's already under way.

At the first meeting of the year chapter president Emily Emerson, junior in architectural engineering, put the transfer of funds to a vote.

At one time, she said, the K-State chapter had hoped to fund the construction of a house all on its own. The purpose of the worldwide Christian organization is to raise funds for and construct houses that can be used by previously homeless area residents.

The chapter, which meets once a month, is always looking for new members, said Vice President Elizabeth Verderber, junior in chemical engineering. All that's really needed is a desire to help those in need, said publicity co-chair Jenny Wright, junior in biological and agricultural engineering.

"We don't just build their house, we help them build their lives," Wright said.

Shelley Faerber, vice president of the Manhattan chapter, said the challenge of Habitat involvement is one of faith. She said the project that the K-State chapter will now get partnership credit for funding is still far from ready, but it began with no funding at all.

"You just have to trust that money will come in when it's needed," she said.

The average cost of building a house is $35,000, and though the K-State chapter is older than the Manhattan affiliate, it has never raised enough money to pay for a house by itself, said former K-State chapter president Kevin Miller. He said the money has always ended up in the hands of the affiliate.

"We're all the same group here," he said.

Melainie Little, K-State chapter treasurer and junior in industrial engineering, said the money retained by the chapter would be enough for the time being.

Little and fund-raising co-chair Andy Buessing, senior in civil engineering, said the chapter will organize benefits, including a concert and a bicycle ride, along with donations from businesses and individuals.

"We do the best that we can," Little said. Obviously $8,665 is better than nothing, she said.

Two representatives of the K-State Rowing Club were in attendance to propose a joint Ergo-Thon, where members of both clubs would find sponsors for their turn on a rowing machine, or ergometer. Specifics were to be discussed at a later date.

Chapter adviser Betty Jo White announced possibilities for members to get involved, including the blood drive and Sunset Zoological Park's Spook-Tacular the weekend before Halloween.

White said three different Methodist churches in town were sponsoring a rice and beans dinner from 5:30 to 7:30 p.m., Sunday Sept. 28 at College Avenue Methodist Church. The dinner is $6.50 a plate, and the majority of the proceeds will go too Habitat, she said.

Emerson said anyone who is interested can attend the next meeting, at 9 p.m. Oct. 21. She said the Collegian bulletin would announce the place.

Faerber said she's only volunteered for Habitat for eight months.

"That's really testament to how desperate they are to get people involved," she said jokingly. "It's endless — the ways you get to use your talents with this organization."

New experimental drug found effective against flu

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — A recent study found an experimental medicine can cut a bout of flu almost in half.

The drug, code-named GG167 and known as zanamivir, works best if used by people with especially bad symptoms or if taken soon after the illness strikes.

In these circumstances, doctors found the medicine reduced a typical episode of flu from seven days to four. However, it made little difference if given late in the infection or when symptoms were mild.

The drug, an inhaled powder, is still being tested and is not yet approved by the Food and Drug Administration for routine use.

Its maker, Glaxo Wellcome, which paid for the latest study, plans more extensive testing during this winter's flu season. A similar drug, code-named GS4104, is being developed by Gilead Sciences Inc. and Hoffman-LaRoche.

Two other flu medicines are already on the market. They are Symmetrel, known generically as amantadine, and Flumadine, known generically as rimantadine.

Both are effective against influenza A, which causes about two-thirds of the estimated 20 million flu cases in the United States each year. But they are useless against influenza B, the viral strain that causes the rest.

Zanamivir has not been tested head-to-head against the other approved flu pills, but unlike them, it works against both varieties of the flu virus.

In the latest study, zanamivir was tested on 262 people with flu infections in the United States and Europe. The study was published in today's issue of the New England Journal of Medicine.

Flu symptoms include fever, coughs, headaches, a sore throat and muscle aches. Most cases can be prevented by the flu vaccine, which is 70- to 90-percent effective in adults.

However, many people

Former K-State leader to give agriculture talk

LANDON TRAWNY
staff reporter

Alpha Zeta, an agricultural fraternity, is continuing to ride the positive wave that began at its national convention in August.

Duane Acker, former K-State president and dean of the College of Agriculture, will visit K-State to speak with students Nov. 4.

▶ Duane Acker, former K-State President, will speak at 2 p.m., Nov. 4 in Williams Auditorium in Umberger Hall.

His speech will be part of the new Alpha Zeta Lecture Series. The purpose of the lecture series is to inform and educate agriculture students at K-State.

David Lott, senior in agricultural journalism and chancellor of Alpha Zeta, said he feels this is an honor to have Acker come back to K-State.

"It is a pretty momentous occasion," Lott said.

Linda Albers, junior in agricultural journalism, said Acker's speech will be about preparing for agriculture beyond the year 2000.

The speech will be another highlight to recent fortunes of the College of Agriculture.

David Mugler, associate dean and director of academic programs of the College of Agriculture, said K-State alumni were among about 100 people honored in August at the National Alpha Zeta Centennial in Columbus, Ohio.

Among the K-State alumni were Mugler; Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan.; Loren Kruse, editor for Successful Farming magazine; and Ivan Strickler. Also honored were Secretary of Agriculture Dan Glickman and Norman Borlaug, winner of the Nobel Peace Prize.

All of them received a medal and a certificate joining them on the Alpha Zeta Centennial Honor Roll.

Mugler said it a was privilege to be nominated.

"I'm quite honored to have been nominated by the students in the local chapter," Mugler said. "It's a team effort, and any honor I get, I need to share with my colleagues."

Lott said the students nominated Mugler for the award because he helped secure funds for the new College of Agriculture Mock-Interview Clinic, spoke at the spring initiation of Alpha Zeta and for his endless support for Alpha Zeta and the College of Agriculture.

"He is always willing to help," Lott said. "He is an excellent adviser and friend."

Lott also said the faculty and staff in the College of Agriculture deserve credit for K-State's notoriety in the field of agriculture.

"It's mind-boggling, trying to think of all the things they've done," Lott said.

Body of millionaire developer discovered; police suspect son withholding information

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEWARK, N.J. — A millionaire developer who disappeared a week ago, after withdrawing $20,000 from his bank account, was found dead Wednesday on the banks of the Hudson River in New York. Three young men have been arrested.

Nelson Gross, a 65-year-old former GOP state chairman who went to prison in the 1970s for illegal fund raising, was apparently stabbed to death in a robbery, police said.

Gross disappeared Sept. 17 after his son saw him driving with two men from a floating restaurant on the New Jersey side of the Hudson River that his family owned.

Gross stopped next at a bank in a shopping plaza he owned and withdrew the $20,000 in cash while one of the men stood by flipping through a newspaper in view of security cameras, published reports said.

The business executive was initially assumed to be kidnapped, but no ransom demands were made.

Gross' silver BMW was found Saturday in New York City, and detectives from a New York anti-drug operation arrested three teen-age suspects early Wednesday. Within six hours, police had found the body in the woods between the Henry Hudson Parkway and the river.

Police would not say how they connected the three to the crime or what charges they will face.

The suspects are above the age of 16, said a law enforcement source who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Gross "appears to have been stabbed," New York City Police Commissioner Howard Safir said. "This appears to have been a robbery."

Published reports said officials were looking into what role Gross' son, Neil, might have played in his father's disappearance after the 33-year-old failed an FBI lie detector test.

Neil Gross said he saw his father driving with two men in his car from the parking lot of the Binghamton Ferryboat, the family's Edgewater restaurant. The son called his father by cellular telephone to see if he was OK, and the elder Gross said he was conducting business and hung up, authorities have said.

"Do we think he caused his father any harm? No," a law enforcement source told The Star-Ledger of Newark. "But do we think he knows more than he's been telling us? Absolutely, yes."

Asked about reports that Gross' son was being investigated, Safir said: "There is no evidence that I am aware of that Mr. Gross was involved."

Police began investigating the younger Gross after a background check turned up a drug conviction, according to published reports. Neil Gross was fined and placed on probation after pleading guilty to crack possession in 1985.

The elder Gross had had a troubled relationship with his son for years, friends said, but three years ago deeded ownership of the restaurant to him and had recently written him into his will.

Gross once led the state's Republican Party and served as a key state contact for President Nixon before a conviction for illegal fund raising forced him to drop out of politics. He served a five-month prison term in 1976.

He had a second career as a restaurateur and developer, buying 12 acres of Hudson River shoreline property and other properties, including a shopping center in Paramus, N.J.

The family had posted a $100,000 reward in the case.

Cars came and went from Gross' two-story home in a wooded area of wealthy Saddle River on Wednesday. Police kept reporters away from the house, on a large lot shielded from the road by tall trees.

Republican Gov. Christie Whitman said she had called Gross' wife, state Racing Commission chairwoman Noel Gross, and expressed her condolences. She said there was "horrific grief" in the family.

NASA unsure about sending U.S. astronaut

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — NASA's chief reviewed two final safety reports Wednesday before deciding whether to send astronaut David Wolf on a long and possibly perilous mission aboard the space station Mir.

Daniel Goldin was expected to make his decision late Wednesday, but not make it public until this morning, just hours before space shuttle Atlantis is scheduled to leave for the decrepit Russian station on a night flight.

President Clinton was expected to support whatever decision NASA makes.

The space agency has never waited until so close to a launch to make such an important announcement regarding an astronaut's flight.

Wolf seemed unphased by the rumors and speculation. He joked with his crewmates and gave a thumbs-up during a gathering of friends and family at the launch pad.

"See you in four to five months," he said.

Goldin, just back from meetings with Russian space officials in Moscow, met Wednesday afternoon with the outside experts who led the two Mir safety reviews, including Gemini and Apollo astronaut Thomas Stafford.

Regardless of what Goldin decides about Wolf, Atlantis will fly to Mir to bring American Michael Foale home after a 4 1/2-month stay and to drop off a replacement computer, patches for holes, food, water and other urgently needed supplies. Wolf still

RAINSTORM ROCKOUT

Despite rain and delays Last Chance plays host to two surprisingly good bands.

MEMBERS OF Ruskabank perform at Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon late Tuesday night. Ruskabank, which plays ska music, performed after Deege, a band from Kansas City.

REVIEW BY KADY GUYTON • PHOTO BY IVAN KOZAR

Music Review

Despite rain, late show times, delays and the fact it was a week night, Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon played host to some surprisingly good music from two very different bands.

Deege, a band new to Manhattan, opened for local band Ruskabank at Last Chance Tuesday night. First seen in Manhattan taking third place at the Opus Band Competition, Deege is back in Kansas after a stint in Los Angles.

"It's really hard to get any kind of buzz going in L.A. unless you are signed to a label or have some sort of gimmick. We came back to work on our next CD and to try to get our name out. It's the big fish in a little-pond theory," said Eason Pritchard, bass guitarist.

While in L.A., Deege also made an appearance on the TV show "Party of Five." In the episode, they played "I Died For You," getting a positive, loud reaction from the crowd.

Their vocals were strong and clear, unlike many other bands who make the mistake of singing from the throat. Deege seems to have figured out the importance of breathing from the diaphragm and projecting their voices.

Although Last Chance on a rainy Tuesday night was probably not the best venue to showcase themselves, Deege did a great job with what they had.

Following Deege, and a quick set breakdown, Ruskabank tore the place up with their signature loud, brassy ska sound. Even non-ska fans needed little encouragement to get up and move their bodies to the music.

Dave Spiker, lead singer for Ruskabank helped the crowd celebrate a couple birthdays and invited them to his own birthday party Friday night at his house.

He also announced the creation and sale of the very first authorized Ruskabank T-shirts.

After the announcements and invitations, Ruskabank proceded to work up a sweat with standards like "Speedy Gonzalez," "Tube Socks" and their signature song "Ruskabank."

After the usual high-energy set, they played an encore at the request of the crowd, who kept hopping to the music.

Tuesday night at Last Chance turned out to be a pleasurable night of diverse, talented music. Those willing to brave the rain were amply rewarded by a couple of great shows.

Variety of shows, lectures on the arts

CHANG GALLERY

The results of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design's 1997 Italian Studies Program are laid out in a whimsical Chang Gallery show (how do they continually find new ways of using this small space?).

The show represents work last spring by eight seniors in architecture: Faye Premer, Jessica Boettcher, Peter Hauff, Heather Worrell, David Dresher, Amy Cox, Janelle Marsden and Jason Wagner.

Art

The students lived and studied together at the Santa Chiara Centro Studi in the Italian hill town of Castiglion Fiorentino, which is between Florence and Rome in the Tuscany region.

Worrell, now a fifth-year senior in architecture, said she liked seeing in person all of the classical architecture she had studied in books.

"The more you see, the more you can design," Worrell said.

She said she attained a greater appreciation for preservation, because Italy enforces codes keeping historic architecture from being torn down.

Outside of traveling throughout Italy, the students also collaborated on a proposed renovation project for housing for the elderly in a monastery attached to San Francesco, a church built in 1114 A.D.

The small gallery show illustrates their trip through drawings and sketches, tourist memorabilia, sketch books and a slide show.

The Italian Studies show closes Oct. 3. The Chang Gallery, in Seaton Hall, is open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday. Admission is free.

UNION ART GALLERY

A show billing itself as "Diverse Expressions," which is artspeak for whatever we had is in this show, is in the Union Art Gallery until Oct. 11.

The show is a collection of work by faculty artists from Columbia Basin College in Pasco, WA. The work represents a multitude of styles, approaches and media.

The exceptions in this show of so-so work are Louis Jensen's "Upper Antelope Canyon" and "Spring Poplars," both black and white photographic prints. Their serene abstract appreciation of nature is worlds away from the snapshot quality of Ian McAdie's "Mount Ranier (Nesqually Lookout)" located nearby.

Perhaps the most amateur "expression" is the low-grade Stella rip-off "Spacial Study, 1995," by Phillip Harding. Why someone felt this work was worthy of a traveling exhibit escapes this writer.

Gallery hours are from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday. Admission is free.

MARIANNA KISTLER BEACH MUSEUM OF ART

Upcoming tours at the art museum include a free tour of the exhibition "John Steuart Curry: Selections from the Permanent Collection," which opens Sept. 30. The tour begins at 7 p.m., Oct. 2.

On Oct. 1, Don Lambert, a writer and art patron from Topeka, will give a Food for Thought lecture at noon in the museum galleries. Lambert will discuss the work of John Steuart Curry.

Kim Stafford, son of the poet William Stafford, will discuss his father's writing at 7 p.m., Oct. 3. This event is in conjunction with the first-annual Flint Hills Literary Festival.

Admission to all events is free. The Beach art museum is open from 11 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., Tuesday through Friday and 1 to 4:30 p.m. on Saturday and Sunday. The museum is open until 8 p.m. on Thursday.

VISITING ARTISTS LECTURES

Doug Martin, a painter based in New York City and a K-State graduate, will discuss his work in a lecture at 11 a.m. Friday at the Beach art museum in the UMB Theatre. Admission is free.

Drive-In sponsored by UPC at Bramlage

JOHN FRANSON
staff writer

Break out the togas, put on a sombrero and load the car with food and drinks.

The Union Program Council will present the films "Three Amigos!" and "National Lampoon's Animal House" at 8:30 tonight in the East Bramlage parking lot. The cost is $2 per person or $5 per carload.

If there is a rainout tonight, there will be no rain date, Jones said. However, they may try to show the films in Forum Hall. Otherwise, the next drive-in movie showing would not be until spring.

Matt Jones, UPC vice president for membership, advised moviegoers to bring something warm.

"It could get chilly," he said.

Jones said turnout for last spring's drive-in night was phenomenal. However, rain forced an abrupt conclusion to the entertainment, because the projection equipment was not protected and could not operate in the rain.

Refunds were issued to all patrons. There was no rain date, since the company that presented the movies travels from town to town and had already left.

'The Edge' reminiscent of adult 'Lord of the Flies'

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Anthony Hopkins looks off into the distance. Alec Baldwin grows stubble. Bears attack Baldwin and Hopkins. Baldwin's steely blue eyes compete with Hopkins' steelier blue eyes. Baldwin and Hopkins bond.

Movie Review

Hopkins and Baldwin fight. Many mountains and rivers and snowstorms are seen. Anthony Hopkins looks off into the distance again.

Thus turns "The Edge" — a gripping, muted, visually extravagant and occasionally annoying effort from director Lee Tamahori and screenwriter David Mamet that chronicles the survival struggles of an introverted billionaire and an egotistical fashion photographer after their plane crashes into the Alaskan wilderness.

Reminiscent at first of "Alive," "The Edge" grows into an adult "Lord of the Flies," as its story narrows and winds its way to its inevitable conclusion. Give Hopkins and Baldwin credit: They, and they alone, share most of the screen time, and things between them are never boring.

Hopkins plays Charles Morse, an aging, bookish rich man with a supermodel wife (Elle MacPherson, whose acting ability isn't really demonstrated here). Morse is struggling with his bookishness and carefully scrutinizing the moves Robert Green (Baldwin) is making on his turf.

Morse accompanies his wife and Robert to a photo shoot at an Alaskan bed-and-breakfast lodge with a photographic crew, and Charles decides to accompany Robert and a photo assistant, Stephen ("Romeo & Juliet's" Harold Perrineau, in a wonderfully charismatic supporting role), to an even more remote cabin in search of an Native American to photograph.

Their plane crashes in a lake along the way — an amazingly harrowing and low-key scene — and Morse, Green and Stephen are left to fend for themselves. They argue but ultimately start working together.

"Most people who get lost in the woods die of shame," Morse says, though weather and a particularly hungry bear come a close second and third.

The bear (Bart the Bear), another prominent star of the movie, is a toothy, drooling mass of fur and flesh who batters and takes a battering (the movie credits include an "animatronic bear" and a mechanical bear motion coordinator). It takes out one of the trio partway through — guess which? (Hint: Stephen is not played by Anthony Hopkins or Alec Baldwin.)

Outstanding actors breathe life, give credence to 'The Assignment'

ASSOCIATED PRESS

At the beginning of "The Assignment," liquid is flowing down a cobbled street in Paris. The camera pulls back, revealing two boys urinating on their way to school. Then there's a long pullback to an apartment across the street, accompanied by sounds of a woman in orgasm. A naked man stands at a window, biting an apple.

Movie Review

Is this symbolism, or simply a director showing off? Whatever it is, it's not a promising opening for an international spy and terrorist movie.

"The Assignment" is based on a farfetched premise: A Cuban American officer in the U.S. Navy bears an amazing resemblance to the world's most notorious terrorist, Carlos — enough of a resemblance that the officer might be used as a double to trigger the assassination of Carlos.

The excellent actor, Aidan Quinn, assumes the dual role, and he brings much-needed credence to the film. He is first seen as Carlos, tossing bombs that murder men, women and children.

Then Quinn becomes Annibal Ramirez, who is captured by the Mossad while visiting Israel. He is tortured until the Mossad leader, Ben Kingsley, discovers that his captive is not the infamous Carlos.

A CIA agent, Donald Sutherland, has been pursuing Carlos since witnessing his cruelty in a Paris bombing. Sutherland and Kingsley concoct their audacious plan: to use the Navy man in an attempt to make the Russians believe Carlos is selling his secrets to the United States.

The secrets involve Carlos' work for the Russians. Thus, Sutherland and Kingsley reason, the Russians themselves will need to murder Carlos.

First, Quinn must undergo a regimen that would make Marine boot training seem like summer camp. He even takes lessons in Carlos' sex techniques from one of his former mistresses.

The long, exhausting training over, Quinn is ready for his challenge. After a series of violent encounters, he appears to have accomplished his mission. Or does he? The film's ending casts some doubt.

The director of "The Assignment," Canadian Christian Duguay, handles the action with an expert hand, and he is blessed by three superior actors who can breathe life into ambivalent characters. But all are hampered by a script by Dan Gordon and Sabi H. Shabtai that attempts too much. Coming on the heels of so many summertime action-adventures, the film has little to distinguish it.

The Triumph Films release was produced by Tom Berry and Franco Battista.

The movie is rated R for language, sexual sequences, nudity and excessive violence.

ROLLING STONES BUILD BRIDGES TO BABYLON

THE ROLLING STONES kicked off their 33-city tour to promote their 39th album, "Bridges to Babylon," in Chicago Tuesday night.

Rolling Stones start tour in Chicago

STORY BY ASSOCIATED PRESS

HICAGO — Gray-haired men as old as Keith Richards sang, a woman holding a boy younger than Mick Jagger's 5-year-old granddaughter danced and teen-age girls shrieked and gyrated.

It means the Rolling Stones are back on tour.

"Da Bulls, da Bears, and now da Stones," Jagger screamed at the crowd at Soldier Field Tuesday night, kicking off the group's first tour in three years.

"We have very good memories of Chicago, where we started off with blues sessions in clubs," the singer told the 50,000 fans who thrilled to vintage hits as well as songs from the band's soon-to-be-released 39th album, "Bridges to Babylon."

The Stones opened their 33-city tour in the town where they had their first American recording session in 1964 in a studio on the city's South Side.

Jagger, belying his 54 years, strutted and danced his way through number after number as the multigenerational crowd ignored the chilly, swirling winds off Lake Michigan and danced and sang along.

The Stones opened with "Satisfaction," then put the crowd in a frenzy by following with "It's Only Rock 'n Roll (But I Like it)."

Michael Conti, 47, of Chicago, said it was his 10th Stones concert.

"I go back to '66 at the Hollywood Bowl. I guess I was stoned. Everybody was. It was crazy," said Conti, whose long graying hair was covered by a cowboy hat.

Kathy Larsen of Crest Hill, Ill., was at the show with her husband, Keith Grape, and 11-year-old son, Andy.

"In '94, I brought my 18-year-old daughter to Soldier Field for the Voodoo Lounge tour," she said. "Now it's Andy's turn."

More than 35 years after their modest beginnings in British clubs, the Stones are expected to draw millions of fans of all ages on this latest swing through the United States, Canada and Mexico.

"I get a lot of letters from 12, 13, 14-year-old kids who know the new stuff," Richards said before the show. "That makes an old guitar picker's heart feel good."

Added the 53-year-old rock icon: "We've kept our original generation, and the one in-between, and there's another one coming up."

Senator suggests splitting Wichita school district

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Barbara Lawrence, Wichita resident and chairwoman of the Senate Education Committee, suggested Wednesday it is time to split up the state's biggest school district, Unified School District 259.

She said it was her idea alone. She has not yet discussed it with Wichita school officials and, she conceded, it might be nearly impossible to accomplish.

However, Lawrence said she is convinced the district is too big to solve its problems and to deliver quality education to students as efficiently as possible.

Lawrence, a Republican, made her suggestion during the Legislature's interim Education Committee's review of state laws on how school district boundaries can be changed.

The Erie-St. Paul USD 101 in southeast Kansas wants to divide into two districts, but there is no state law providing a way to do that.

"When a school district gets too large, it sometimes does not work," Lawrence said as the committee reviewed state school district consolidation, disorganization and territory transfer laws.

"With almost 50,000 students," she said of the Wichita School District, "it is getting unwieldy and is having difficulty getting the results it wants."

In a later interview, Lawrence said research shows that "education is delivered better in a smaller setting."

"Wichita is struggling in many ways," she said. "Right now, it does an excellent job with what it has. But it's unable to pass an LOB (local option budget), its test scores are among the lowest in the state, and I think everything shows it's very difficult to get the results you want in a very large district."

The Wichita district had 43,984 full-time equivalent students for the 1996-97 school year, and this year's total is not expected to vary from that figure.

That makes Wichita 44 percent larger than Kansas' next-biggest school district, which is Shawnee Mission in Johnson County. It had 30,478 students last school year.

Next came Kansas City, Kan., with 20,405 students a year ago; Olathe with 17,556, Blue Valley (both also in Johnson County) with 13,854; and Topeka with 13,375. No other school district has more than 10,000 students, although Lawrence, with 9,607 a year ago, could crack that level soon.

"I realize Wichita is not large in comparison to some metropolitan districts, but it's still too large for a good education delivery system," Lawrence said. "We bus some kids for an hour. If that system was broken up, it would cut down on that."

Lawrence said she thinks splitting it three ways would be best, but that probably is an unrealistic goal.

Asked why her thoughts on dividing the Wichita district popped out at Wednesday's meeting, she said: "It's because of what we were studying. I just thought I would bring it up to give the committee something to think about. We would be opening a big door if we changed the law to allow for the division of school districts.

"There still are scars from the '60s consolidation of districts, and if this door was opened, I'm sure we'd see many more trying to split themselves to take it back the way it was," Lawrence continued. "There would have to be specific legislation to let specific school districts do it, and even then it might be a Pandora's Box with districts coming to the Legislature wanting to do it. That's what we've got to weigh: Is there some way to do this?"

Present state law provides only for procedures for dissolving a school district and attaching its territory to surrounding districts; transferring territory from one district to another; and consolidating two districts.

There is no way according to present law to divide a district.

In the past 25 years, only seven districts have ceased to exist — five by disorganizing and giving their territories to adjacent districts and two by consolidating with other districts.

Edson, Kan.; Natoma, Kan.; Kendall, Kan.; Powhattan Kan.; and Lebanon, Kan.; have disorganized, while Bird City, Kan., merged with McDonald, and Esbon consolidated with Burr Oak.

Kansas has 304 school districts.

and the "Make-It and Take-It" arts and crafts center.

"Children are exposed to programs where they can make pottery, ceramics and other arts and crafts," Korte said. There will be a nominal charge for some of the children's activities, but it is very reasonable, Korte said.

> It is all interesting and educational. Where else could you see all this in one day?
> • Ann Pavlik, recreation supervisor for Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation

The third area of the festival will include about 100 arts and crafts vendors from Kansas and all the surrounding states. There will be a variety of products, featuring new and returning vendors, Pavlik said.

A juried art area will feature local artists who submit their work to be judged. The judging will include categories like Best of Show. The art will be available for purchase.

"We still have room available if people are interested in featuring their work in either category. We will take entries as long as space is available," Pavlik said.

Entertainment and demonstrations are scheduled to run throughout the festival at various times. Some local artists will include the Dark Side, a rock 'n' roll group; Mark Hank Monroe, a country singer; Zerf, a pioneer and cowboy musician; and returning to the stage will be folk musician Jeb Bolan.

All entertainment will be on the stage in the park.

Pavlik said other demonstrations throughout the day will include a blacksmith, knife-maker, spinners, weavers and quilters, and antique cars and tractors.

Riley County Historical Society will be on hand to give tours and information on a log cabin which will be in the park.

"There's so much, it is hard to focus on just one thing," Pavlik said. "It is a fun time with stuff for everyone."

The festival features food vendors selling everything from cotton candy and homemade root beer to ethnic food.

Most of the festival is free, including all demonstrations and entertainment. Pavlik said the festival will not be affected by rain and expects 4,000 to 5,000 people to attend the events per day.

"It is all interesting and educational," Pavlik said. "Where else could you see all this in one day?"

Mir

might go along for the ride.

The 11 1/2-year-old Mir has encountered a parade of problems in the past seven months, most notably a terrifying fire and collision that almost forced the crew to abandon ship.

Many experts, however, believe the recurring trouble to be more worrisome: computer crashes, cooling-loop leaks, oxygen-generator breakdowns and malfunctions in the carbon dioxide removal system.

NASA's inspector general expressed concern about such problems in testimony before the House Science Committee last week and committee leaders oppose putting Wolf on Mir.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry said the president has taken a hands-off approach to the Mir decision.

"The White House involvement, whether it's been the president, the vice president, the chief of staff, has been just to be reassured that the process used at NASA for review is an adequate one and has a number of different peer reviews built into the system. But technically, and in terms of policy, it seems to be a very thorough one," McCurry said.

Wolf, 41, an unmarried doctor and engineer who spent the past year undergoing cosmonaut training in Russia, has said he is eager to move into Mir.

He would be the sixth American to live on Mir and help pave the way for the future international space station.

Age

because it's been hard to demonstrate biological explanations.

Manning said his work was inspired by research showing that elite groups like American presidents produce slightly more sons than other people do. The evolutionary explanation is that in a class-conscious society where rank is inherited through sons, it would pay elite couples to have sons. For low-ranking couples, it would make sense to have daughters who could marry upward in status.

The researchers thought that the age difference between husband and wife might be related to social status. They reasoned that in societies with repeated marriages or polygamy, well-off men would be able to use their riches to attract wives who are younger than they are. So researchers expected couples where the man is older to have an excess of sons.

When they looked at the 301 families from Liverpool, they found that was the case, but only for firstborns. Secondborns showed no significant trend, for reasons Manning couldn't explain.

When it came to firstborns, couples in which the husband was five to 17 years older than the wife had 37 sons and 20 daughters. Couples in which the wives were one to nine years older than their husbands had 29 daughters and 14 sons.

When researchers looked at marriage and birth records for England and Wales from 1911 to 1952, they found that the age gap between husband and wife was related to the ratio of newborn boys to girls.

What's causing this? Manning said he favors the possibility that somehow, women tend to have more miscarriages with fetuses of one sex or the other, depending on whether the father is older or younger than they are. But there's no evidence for that, he said.

When it came to explaining his result biologically, he said, "We're on very shaky ground."

Morse, meanwhile, grows into a Cliff Clavin of the wild, summoning the most obscure tidbits, often to the annoyance of others. He makes compasses out of paper clips, identifies the markings on Cree Indian oars and knows how to season meat with gunpowder. It starts to resemble a "Saturday Night Live" skit: After every harrowing experience, he spews forth with something like, "Did you know you can make fire from ice?"

Baldwin, his character battling injuries, uncertainty and his own ego, does a marvelous job of creating a self-absorbed boor who dances on the fringes of trustworthiness and heroism but always harbors that trademark smarminess only a Baldwin can muster.

The photography is lush and beautiful, dramatic but never overly lingering. Never have mountains and Great Northern scenery seemed so vast and yet so real. But what do you expect, after all, when the cinematographer's name is Donald McAlpine?

The strength of "The Edge" lies in its narrow focus: It starts and ends in the wild, with no outside backstories, no people back in the city looking for Morse, no "missing billionaire" headlines. It offers only a few characters, and that small group quickly narrows to two, creating the real tension of the story. Everything else is incidental — perfect for a movie in which the wilderness is supposed to be a clarifying force.

Who eventually triumphs and survives is kind of beside the point. It's a wild ride, a personal battle between book knowledge and brashness, goodheartedness and selfishness. Full of anger, angst and great winter wardrobes, "The Edge" isn't great filmmaking, but it's good, engaging and more worthy than most films of its kind.

And you even get to see Baldwin and Hopkins wearing bearskin.

"The Edge," rated R, is directed by Lee Tamahori from a David Mamet screenplay. It is produced by Art Linson.

embassy so he could prepare for the American protesters.

"That was the first time I blurted out, 'What a foolish thing to do.' That was the first time I deviated from the line," Kalugin said.

In 1979, he said he learned that an agent he had recruited in his early career had been arrested by the KGB in suspicion of being part of the CIA. Kalugin said he knew this was not true but was asked by the KGB to confront the man and force a confession.

"When I went to see if I could get a confession, he looked at me with tears and cried, 'You ruined my life,'" Kalugin said. "I went back to the KGB and said 'No, he's not with the CIA.' That was too much for a general to challenge the system. I was relieved of my duties and exiled to my hometown, St. Petersburg."

After retiring, Kalugin publicly denounced the KGB at an important gathering of Soviet reformers. After that, then-president of the former Soviet Union Mikhail Gorbachev issued a decree, stripping Kalugin of his rank and honors.

do not take the shots, and Dr. Frederick G. Hayden, who directed the latest study, said zanamivir is likely to find users if it is eventually approved.

"Influenza is not a trivial illness," said Hayden, a physician at the University of Virginia. "Cough goes on for a week or longer. People often don't fully recover for several weeks."

Besides the need to get treated quickly, another drawback of the treatment is the sometimes difficult chore of diagnosing exactly who has the flu. No simple test exists, and doctors typically are guided by symptoms alone.

In the latest research, doctors initially enrolled 417 suspected flu cases in the study. However, one-fourth of the European patients and half of the Americans turned out not to have the flu at all.

In an editorial in the journal, Dr. Robert B. Couch of Baylor College of Medicine said zanamivir appears to be very safe and might also help prevent people from catching the flu.

The drug works by blocking a protein called neuraminidase, which the virus needs to penetrate mucous secretions and to release new copies of the virus from infected cells.

President honors 40 years of desegregation

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — In a powerful gesture of racial healing, President Clinton pulled open the front door of Central High School Thursday and stood back to welcome nine blacks who had braved hate-filled mobs 40 years ago to break an all-white color barrier.

"What happened here changed the course of our country forever," Clinton said, recalling a racial drama that wrenched America.

"Forty years ago today, they climbed these steps, passed through this door and moved our nation. And for that we must all thank them," said Clinton. The audience — blacks and whites together — roared approval.

But even as he commemorated an important, early victory of the civil rights movement, Clinton warned that American schools are resegregating, opportunities for jobs and education remain unequal and affirmative action programs are being rolled back, "slamming shut the doors of higher education on a new generation."

Clinton

"Segregation is no longer the law," he said, "but too often separation is still the rule. And we cannot forget one stubborn fact that has not yet been said as clearly as it should: There is still discrimination in America.

"We have to keep working on it — not just with our voices but with our laws," the president said. "And we have to engage each other in it."

Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, a Republican, also stirred the crowd, saying, "What happened here 40 years ago was simply wrong. It was evil. And we renounce it."

Huckabee, a Baptist minister, said that in many parts of the South, "It was the white churches that helped not only ignore the problems of racism but in many cases actually fostered those feelings and those sentiments." He called on all religious leaders "to say never, never, never, never again will we be silent."

Clinton was 11 years old during the Little Rock crisis, attending segregated schools 50 miles away in Hot Springs. "It was Little Rock that made racial equality a driving obsession in my life," he said.

Now middle-aged, the so-called Little Rock Nine — six women and three men — basked in cheers and applause, a sharp contrast to the taunts and jeers they braved as teen-agers. The president led them up Central's steps and he held open the school's heavy glass-paneled doors, greeting each of the nine with a handshake or a pat. Clinton was assisted by Huckabee and Little Rock Mayor Jim Dailey.

The dramatic gesture had been suggested by students and by the nine who had been

Open forum lets students air concerns

Students had the opportunity to voice their comments and concerns in an administrative forum sponsored by Mortar Board.

The panel, which consisted of five members, conducted the annual forum meeting at noon Thursday in the Union Courtyard.

Students had the opportunity to ask questions or make comments regarding K-State. About 50 students attended the event.

Among the topics discussed were the new Wildcat Cards and questions surrounding them. Most students wanted to know why freshmen and transfer students were the only ones charged for the cards.

"We consulted last year's student government leaders, and I made a decision that we could pass it on to our new students. Freshmen are in the position to use the card longer than anyone else," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

In addition, many students voiced concerns regarding the new punch-style student football tickets. The main problems raised concerned possible loss or damage to the card.

One student was concerned about the lack of bicycle lanes and racks on campus.

"In the last two weeks, we've added more than 30 bicycle racks. That's not perfect, but we're getting them out there," Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said.

Another topic was the construction of the golf course and whether it would be available to students at a discounted price of 50 percent.

"The plans at this point are to have (the discount) available to students, faculty and alumni in a three-county area — Riley, Geary and Pottawatomie counties," said Bob Krause, vice president of institutional

Team focuses on strategies for students in college life

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff reporter

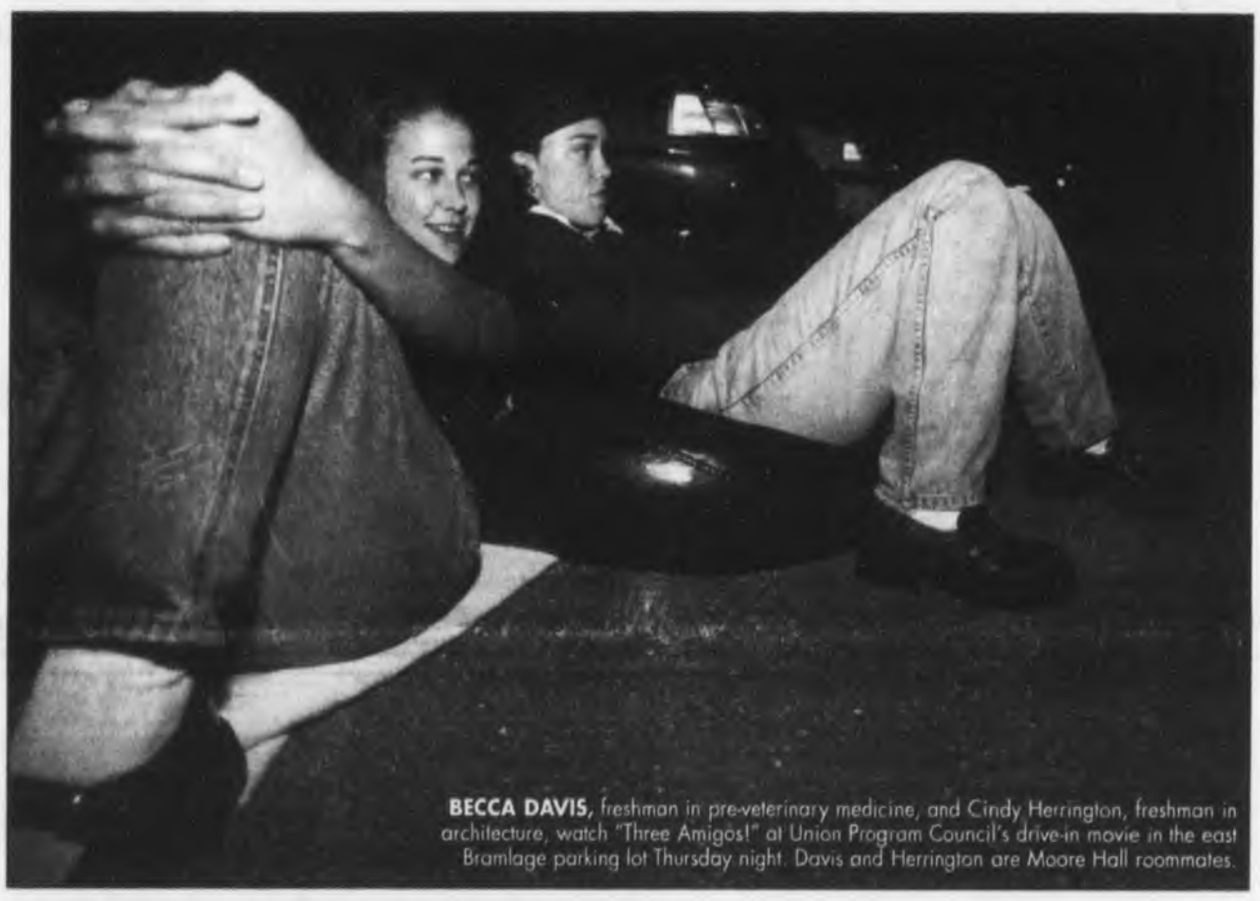
The Student Action Team is taking a practical approach in dealing with critical issues at the collegiate level.

"The SAT is designed to deal with critical issues or anything that causes a crisis for students," said Paul English, senior in history.

▶ Next meeting. The Student Action Team will meet at 7 p.m. Wednesday in the basement of Putnam Hall. For info about the team, contact Heidi Eichman at 395-2066.

SAT was founded three years ago by English, who served as education program coordinator for the Association of Residence Halls at the time. He is now the regional director of SAT, an organization that is catching on across college and university campuses nationwide.

Although there are organizations on campus that provide services addressing critical issues, SAT focuses on bringing the programs to the residence halls, he said.



"You don't see Lafene programming in residence halls," English said. "You see some, but not as much as you should."

English said it is difficult for other organizations such as Lafene Health Center and the Crisis Center Inc. to give residence halls the time and attention they need. They have a limited budget to provide programs and services to a whole campus. SAT largely draws on the programs they provide to help supply programming for their organization.

"It's not a competition. It is a complement and enhancement to the services and programs that are provided," English said. "SAT encourages people to go to programming and services other organizations provide, but at the same time brings them in contact with the residence halls."

He said SAT is more of a networking organization that does the advertising to get people to attend the programming offered by those

More than 200 people watched the drive-in presentation of "Three Amigos!" and "National Lampoon's Animal House" Thursday night in the east Bramlage Coliseum parking lot. Union Program Council organized the event and Sun Technical from Northampton, Mass., presented it.

Organizers were happy to have clear skies because the event was rained out last spring.

"We were trying to pick during the fall when it wouldn't be so rainy," Michael Bishop, UPC Feature Films Committee chair, said. "It turns out that we made a good choice. I was really worried because it was raining all the way up until now. We were really hoping we could show the movie this year. That was a mess last year."

No rain date was scheduled last spring, because the company that presents the movie travels from city to city and had to leave soon after the event. Bart Feller, operations manager for Sun Technical, said showing movies in the rain is impossible.

Delta Upsilon wins best chapter award in national contest

ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI
staff reporter

The men of Delta Upsilon had much to celebrate when they returned to school this semester.

This summer, at the international fraternity's annual conference, the K-State chapter earned several national honors, including the award of top chapter.

GREEK LIFE

The process to apply for the sweepstakes trophy of top chapter in the United States and Canada was lengthy and demanding, said Scott Leahy, DU vice president.

"It was a huge application process. It was 200-some pages long, and all of the officers put something into it," Leahy said.

> "It created a sense of responsibility. Officers had to organize and present their office. It really helped our overall motivation as a chapter and built confidence in our officers."
> • Brian Vulgamore
> Delta Upsilon president

The process, which began at the beginning of last semester, took the effort of all officers and members to complete and perfect. Officers each put in time to write a section about its offices, and then the executive officers helped rewrite and improve them.

"They turned it in, and then we edited it and gave it back to them for changes. Sometimes, we would have to do it two or three times before we were happy with it," said Brian Vulgamore, DU president.

Competition for the title of top chapter and possession of the sweepstakes trophy included all other 85 DU chapters. The K-State chapter was chosen because of their overall strength and leadership as a house.

Dave Fritchen, DU adviser and assistant professor of architectural engineering and construction science, said he felt the chapter deserved the award.

"The leadership they have in the K-State chapter is some of the best I've ever seen. I'm very pleased that they were recognized for their time and hard work. It shows them that this kind of leadership and support for the chapter is worthwhile," Fritchen said.

The fraternity members, more than 90 of them, wanted to win the 4-foot trophy for several reasons. Alumni support and recognition was one of the main goals behind applying for the award, Vulgamore said.

"We're trying to build alumni support for our Vision

"I THINK LACK OF FAITH IS A HUGE PROBLEM — FAITH IS A SOLUTION TO SO MANY PROBLEMS WE HAVE."
TRACEY MANN, STUDENT SENATE VICE CHAIR

THE FAITH FACTOR

Student leaders use faith in their daily lives

BRANDI HERTIG
staff reporter

Morning comes early for Student Senate Vice Chair Tracey Mann. Awake at 6 a.m., he doesn't immediately concern himself with Senate issues or school. He's spending that time reading the Bible, praying and looking to Jesus for inspiration.

Mann

"Jesus was the greatest leader of all time, because he has more followers than anyone else still to this day," Mann said.

Mann, with Student Body President Tim Riemann, Vice President Jennafer Neufeld and other student leaders, is attending the National Leadership Forum on Faith and Values in Washington, D.C., this weekend.

Faith is an important facet of their lives and their positions as student leaders, Mann said.

Mann and Neufeld attend Icthus Christian Fellowship on Sunday nights and said they found open arms there, though some might be surprised to learn the student leaders have morals they uphold.

Riemann

"It's normal to hear not-so-positive things about people in leadership positions," Neufeld said.

Everyone mixes in at Icthus, so positions and titles don't become such a big deal, she said.

In local, state and national political arenas, Mann said the media have a hand in painting a less-than-flattering portrait of representatives and senators.

"The media says everyone in D.C. doesn't believe, and they're all corrupt, evil, dirty people," he said.

Neufeld attributed that stereotype to the stature of people in Washington, D.C. Because they're set apart from everyone else, the black marks are magnified, she said.

During his time in Washington, D.C., this summer, Mann said he was amazed at the number of representatives and senators who are Christian.

Neufeld

A good number of them are part-time ministers or pastors as well, he said.

However, Mann also said faith is lacking in our leaders.

"I think lack of faith is a huge problem — faith is a solution to so many problems we have," he said.

Riemann pointed out that he tries not to generalize when considering representatives and senators, but looks at them on an individual basis.

"For every person we'd consider a lump of coal, there are a lot of shining stars," he said.

To combine her faith and her role as student body vice president, Neufeld said she thinks of her faith when putting policies together and when finding the people who would do the best possible job for students to fill positions.

"It's a constant improvement process to remember you have to combine everything that you believe into your leadership role," she said.

Riemann said keeping a balance between the two is a challenge.

"It's definitely a roller-coaster ride," he said.

Mann said leadership and faith complement each other.

"If your faith is a central part of your life, then that can't help but be incorporated," he said.

Riemann, Neufeld and Mann each said they are eager to learn how other student leaders from across the nation and the world use their faith in their roles as leaders.

"The answers don't come from positions — they come from who you are and your relationship with God," Mann said.

Bike loan project fails in Portland, new group hopes to try again

PORTLAND, Ore. — Three years ago a nonprofit group began leaving yellow bicycles around town in a show of neighborliness and confidence in the basic honesty of people.

Anyone who needed a ride could take one. There was only one rule: Leave the bike in a public place for someone else. Eventually hundreds of bikes were introduced all over Portland.

The Yellow Bike Project, modeled after a program in Amsterdam, inspired similar efforts in U.S. cities from St. Paul, Minn., to Austin, Texas.

But today you'd be hard-pressed to find one of the bikes on a Portland street.

Riders started taking them home, and they didn't seem to mind that the bikes were painted from seat to spokes in a loud, hot-dog mustard shade of yellow and were made of parts that were a few pedals away from the landfill.

The Yellow Bike Project's phone has now been disconnected, and Tom O'Keefe, its founder, is said to have moved to Arizona.

Another nonprofit group, the Community Cycling Center, is hoping to get the Yellow Bike concept rolling again. Workers are fixing up donated Schwinns and Huffys, and the group is hoping to release a new fleet of bikes in the spring.

FTC investigates whether Intel violated antitrust, monopoly laws

SANTA CLARA, Calif. — For the second time in less than five years, the Federal Trade Commission is investigating whether Intel Corp. violated antitrust law by trying to monopolize the market for computer chips.

Intel, based in Santa Clara, makes the microprocessors in 85 percent of all personal computers.

The FTC said it wants to determine if Intel has acted "to monopolize, attempt to monopolize or otherwise restrict price or non-price competition in the development or sale of microprocessor or other computer components or related intellectual property," Chuck Mulloy, company spokesman said, reading from the subpoena delivered Wednesday.

Four years ago the FTC conducted a similar investigation, then declared that no additional action was called for and closed the probe. Intel said it expects the new investigation will end the same way.

The federal probe follows Intel's planned $420 million purchase of Chips & Technologies Inc., a maker of graphics chips.

Would-be robber with shotgun outgunned in seafood restaurant

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — A would-be robber with a shotgun strode into a diner, ordered everyone to the floor, then had two customers pull guns of their own and start firing away.

When the masked gunman grabbed waitress Amy Norton and tried to get her to open the cash register at Sam's St. Johns Seafood, 69-year-old Oscar Moore, who carries a gun at all times, pulled out his .22-caliber revolver and shot the gunman in the abdomen.

"That gun I didn't trust to try to go for a head shot," Moore said. "If I'd another gun with me, I'd have gone for a head shot, taken care of it from here to eternity."

Another diner, 81-year-old Robert Guerry, pulled out a .22-caliber Derringer and fired at the teen as the foiled robber fled the restaurant where about 30 patrons were eating Monday evening.

Later that night, police arrested Dervonne Marquise Moore, 17, of Jacksonville, when he arrived at a hospital to get a gunshot wound treated. The suspect was charged with armed robbery and was listed today in fair condition.

Police said the gun-toting customers won't be charged.

Manhattan resident paints town purple with Powercats, pure Wildcat pride

ASHLEY YOULE
staff reporter

One word. Purple.

Susan Moss, Manhattan resident, has purple in her veins. And on her walls. And above her fireplace. And on the outside of her house.

Arguably one of the biggest Wildcat fans, Moss has painted her house purple to show K-State how much pride she has.

It isn't often you see a silver-gray house trimmed with purple Powercats on the shutters, the garage, the mailbox and on all sides of the house.

"I've been wanting to do this for years," Moss said.

Ten years to be exact, but her husband would have no part of it and never gave his approval.

Finally, in September 1996, her son asked her what she wanted for her birthday. Her response: "I want purple paint to paint my house," she said.

The next day, a check from her son in the amount of $6,000 was in her hands, and her dream had come true.

"I would never spend my money on something like that," said Carol Woodard, Moss' sister. "I knew she was a big fan, but I knew her husband didn't approve. I never really thought she'd pull it off."

No one in her family has ever attended K-State, and neither has Moss. She said her support comes from the pride she's had for K-State her entire life.

"I was born and raised here," she said. "I have always been a sports fan, and I believe being a fan is supporting your team through good seasons and bad."

Moss has lived in the house for 20 years and said she has never been more excited.

"I don't care what others think. I painted my house because I am very proud to be living in Wildcat country and I always have been. This is how I show my support," she said.

Luckily, her husband has grown to accept the house, considering he, with the help of some friends, ended up doing all of the painting.

Not concerned about what others think, neighbors seem to enjoy the attraction.

"My neighbors think my house is awesome," Moss said.

Woodard said she thinks differently.

"You can't miss it, that's for sure. I guess we're lucky. She wanted to paint the tiles of the roof and spell out WILDCATS," she said.

Some students appreciate support for K-State from the community.

"I think it's neat that she has so much spirit for K-State. It goes to show that the students aren't the only ones who support the Wildcats, the community does, too," said Aimee Jackson, senior in interior design.

The inside of the Moss home matches the exterior.

"My family room is my K-State room. I have K-State things hanging on my walls and above my fireplace," Moss said.

Even though her dream came true, she says she's not done. Moss is hoping to continue showing her pride by someday painting her car purple.

"Right now, my husband won't let me," she said. Instead, she might settle for magnetic Powercats.

Moss has no regrets about painting her house. In fact, because of it, she plans on never leaving.

"We're never moving," she said, "because I plan on dying in this house."

Wildcat Cookoff debuts with barbecue contest

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff writer

The smell of hot barbecue and hickory smoke will be filling the air in Manhattan.

The first Wildcat Cookoff is set to take place Sunday in front of Manhattan Town Center. The cookoff is being sponsored by KXBZ-FM 104.7, KMKF-FM 101.5 and KMAN-AM 1350 radio.

Eric Weber, sales manager for B104, said he expects a great turnout for the event.

"This is going to be a great event," Weber said. "There isn't anything in this area like this. Wichita and Kansas City have huge turnouts for their cookoffs because the food is wonderful. It should be a great event for us as well."

There will be eight different categories of barbecue. There are chicken, pork, ribs and beef. Each of these can be cooked over a direct flame or an indirect flame.

Josh Rohr, senior in life sciences, said he plans to take advantage of all the great barbecue being offered.

"I can't wait. I've been to one of the cookoffs in Kansas City, and the food was amazing," Rohr said. "You get a ton of good food for almost no money at all."

To register as a sampler, you must buy a barbecue button at the Customer Service Booth in the Town Center. The cost of a button is $2.

Monnie Applegate, who helped coordinate the event, said it should be a great deal for everyone involved.

"Everyone loves barbecue, and for $2, you can taste some of the best barbecue around," Applegate said. "Everyone taste-testing will be able to get their fill of great food."

Fifteen to 20 barbecuers are expected for Manhattan's first cookoff. The event is not a nationally sanctioned event like the ones in Wichita or Kansas City, but Weber is confident that in a couple of years it will be.

"It's kind of like a baseball player. You have to start out in the minor leagues. Then you move up to the next level, and finally, you make it to the majors," Weber said. "In three years, we will hope to be in the big leagues."

Prizes will be awarded to the top barbecuer based on taste. Six judges will sample the barbecue and determine the winner.

There will also be a People's Choice award. This award will be given by barbecue samplers. The barbecuer with the most votes will win the award and a $300 cash prize.

"I don't know what kind of barbecue I like best," Rohr said. "All I know is that there is going to be a lot of darn good food there."

Chamber of Commerce increasing numbers with membership drive

KRISTIN BOYD
staff writer

Time is running out, and coaches are wondering which team will make the winning touchdown toward membership for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Only one more week remains for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce's 1997 Membership Drive.

This year the "It's Your Chamber ... Get in the Game" campaign is centered on a football theme.

"We had our own Chamber of Commerce football league," said Eileen Roufa, membership and programs director for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

More than 80 volunteers were divided into eight different teams. Each team had its own name and captain.

To carry out its theme, the chamber had training sessions for its volunteers and a kickoff luncheon.

Each week the teams met to report their scores for their quarter of playing time.

To date, the chamber has secured about 100 new members from the drive. Harry Watts, chairman of the membership drive, said the new members can still receive a signing bonus for joining the chamber. This package includes $133 in benefits for the new member.

"By joining the chamber, new members are making an investment in our community," Roufa said.

The new members will have a chance to meet and learn more about chamber programs and services during a new member orientation Oct. 8 at Manhattan Town Center.

The final score for the competition will be announced at the conclusion of the membership drive. The drive will end with a tailgate party at 11 a.m. Saturday in the parking lot of KSU Stadium prior to the Bowling Green game.

"The chamber has never been this successful with a membership drive. There seems to be a lot of excitement through the community from enthusiasm of volunteers and so on," Roufa said.

Turn KSU Stadium into 'The Purple Horseshoe' this weekend

It's time to get together, K-State fans.

The Wildcats have been among the elite football teams in the nation for the past five years.

It's time to make KSU Stadium one of the elite and unique atmospheres in college football as well.

Nobody is doubting the devotion or ingenuity of Cat fans. KSU Stadium is packed on a consistent basis, tons of fans made the trek to Dallas for the Cotton Bowl, "Good for another Wildcat FIRST DOWN!" has become a loud battle cry, and people can tell when the game is starting by hearing 40,000 sets of keys rattle.

The sounds of KSU Stadium can intimidate opponents.

It's time for the sights to strike fear in opponents as well.

Contrary to popular belief, purple is K-State's only official color.

To make an intimidating and fun atmosphere, wear purple to the game. Everybody. If you don't have something purple for the season, buy something.

There is not a more intimidating atmosphere in college football than Nebraska, the Sea of Red.

The Winnipeg Jets' fans all wore white for the playoffs, creating "White Noise." It was a great atmosphere and very intimidating to opponents.

The ICAT section looks great, with most people in their purple shirts.

If everyone wore purple, ICAT or not, it would make the stadium look great, both in person and on television.

Lucky Charms has purple horseshoes. KSU Stadium could soon be known as "The Purple Horseshoe" if fans would cooperate. A nickname for the stadium would be the highest honor to give to K-State fans and intimidate teams that much more than the team already does.

There is no reason this couldn't become a tradition like "Another Wildcat FIRST DOWN."

K-State is not far from becoming one of the truly special atmospheres in college football. "The Purple Horseshoe" would show everyone what we already know.

K-State fans are the best anywhere.

A TRIP TO WINFIELD ENDS UP WITH A NANCY REAGAN METAMORPHOSIS

VIEWPOINT

BRANDI HERTIG

As I made my annual trip down Winfield, Kan., way for the Walnut Valley Festival, a four-day bluegrass heaven, I bounced excitedly in the driver's seat. I was looking forward to getting away from the tangled mass that had become my life and seeing some old friends.

Now I'll admit right here without too much shame that the majority of my pals I hung out with in Winfield are still in high school, because I'm not so far-removed from that God-forsaken situation myself. And the point that they are in high school will come into play later. I don't just arbitrarily throw stuff in, folks.

Don't you know me better than that by now?

So we all met up and had a good time, sharing funnel cakes and stompin' our feet to the music. That, I realized later, just acted to perpetuate the notion in my head that my beloved friends had come to Winfield to hear these lovely tunes.

Later at night, we're hanging out around the campfire when some kid whips out a "fatty blunt" (as K-State alumnus Zach Baze refers to them) I wasn't surprised, but nonetheless was disturbed by watching the likes of these kids toke it up like they were extras in a Cheech and Chong flick.

Upon registering my own disgust, I began to feel like the Beaver's mom or, even worse, Nancy Reagan. I'm 19, a liberal tie-dye wearin' freak, and I love the Grateful Dead. Guess I should be rolling me some Js along with my Froot Loops and orange juice, eh? I can't remember what I did in response that day. I think I just ate a sandwich.

The next day, a few of us gathered under a tarp to get out of the rain. And, as if the THC fairy had come down upon our campsite, a joint magically appeared. As they passed it around, I tried to think of some way to refuse when it made its way to me. And now, I don't know if I had, "Damn, you're stupid" on my forehead or what, but they just passed the thing over me, making me want to say, "Now don't you be droppin' your doobie on me head, kids."

It was like I was the hip mom in the neighborhood who let her kids toke it up at home.

And I wanted to say, "Damn, you're stupid" to these kids (and I really cannot reiterate "kids" enough). Especially to the one who incessantly talked about how he had the "munchies, man" and ate a whole box of Vienna Fingers. But I said nothing.

What could I? The one time I voiced my concern to one of my best friends about a year or so ago, she looked at me and said quite matter-of-factly, "Well, Brandi, I think we know a little more about it than you do."

Well, as they say, knowledge is power.

And I'll readily admit I've never done "field research" on marijuana, but I'll also admit I don't believe for a second that it's a benign drug that's just gotten a bad rap. Having lived around it for a good number of years and seeing its effects firsthand, I cannot be convinced that pot doesn't cook brains.

And I'm not sure what's so wrong with anyone's life that they need to find artificial escape. If any sort of drug (save caffeine) were necessary to getting through messy and unpleasant periods in life, I'd have to be puffin' on a big fatty on during class, at work, in the shower, etc. But I'm not, and I seem to be surviving. Maybe I'll drop dead tomorrow because I didn't hook up with the chronic.

Guess that'll learn me.

People will do what they will, and they will think themselves invincible and hip and alternative and all that good stuff.

These kids are the kids who absorbed much of the "Just Say No" campaign. These kids are products of the D.A.R.E. program. Well heck, some of these kids are probably role models for D.A.R.E. Back in my day, it wasn't uncommon for the role models to do a little bending of the elbow and toking on the weekends.

The best and the brightest of our future are spending their free time sparking it up and dimming their potential and those of us who know better are turning away and eating sandwiches.

The result?

Perhaps someday the debate won't be over whether the president might have inhaled a joint back in the day, but whether the president is too toasted to deliver the State of the Union address.

Upon registering my own disgust, I began to feel like the Beaver's mom or, even worse, Nancy Reagan. I'm 19, a liberal tie-dye wearin' freak, and I love the Grateful Dead. Guess I should be rolling me some Js along with my Froot Loops and orange juice, eh? I can't remember what I did in response that day. I think I just ate a sandwich.

Advantages of youth make it hard to grow up

Every day after class I go home, throw my bookbag on the floor and turn on my television to watch cartoons. I've been doing it for 15 years, and I don't plan on stopping anytime soon.

I just don't want to grow up.

And it's not like I just watch cartoons that are aimed at young adults, such as "The Simpsons" or "King of the Hill." No, I watch programs that offer no wit or wisdom to someone my age. I watch Nickelodeon cartoons. I watch the "Superfriends," "Bullwinkle, "Looney Toons."

Don't even get me started.

But my obsession with cartoons is just a small part of a much larger issue. I really am stuck in childhood, so to speak. Sure, I can act mature when I want to, but most of the time I am engrossed in the innocence of youth.

After a rainstorm, I go stomping in puddles.

I eat Lucky Charms.

When I go to bed, I pull my blanky over my head so I feel more secure.

I hit girls I like.

When I prove someone wrong, I say "face."

I do all sorts of things 20-year-olds shouldn't do.

This is not to say I act completely like a child. I take showers, not baths. I love to brush my teeth. I willingly eat my vegetables. And I will never say I don't want to go to bed.

Psychologically, there are many explanations for trying to remain a child. When I was young, I acted rather mature for my age. I forced myself to act older than I actually was, which sort of deprived me of a childhood.

It could be, some psychologists would argue, that I am not experiencing a second childhood, but instead a first one. By depriving myself of adolescence when I was young, I have forced myself to experience it later in my life.

> But my obsession with cartoons is just a small part of a much larger issue. I really am stuck in childhood, so to speak. Sure, I can act mature when I want to, but most of the time I am engrossed in the innocence of youth.

Another possibility could be that I see so many benefits of being young — recklessness, innocence, lack of responsibility — that it was to my advantage to remain childish in spirit.

But being a child can have disadvantages as well. Video games, while soothing my inner child, are highly detrimental to my academic expectations. And picking my nose in public doesn't leave a great impression on others.

Eating Flintstones vitamins isn't doing much for me anymore, nor is being stuck on Lion King Band-Aids ('cause they're stuck on me).

However, aside from these extremes, I'm really not too different from other people. Everyone I know has some sort of immaturity complex, such as chewing on pens, gossiping or joining fraternities. A little youthfulness is good for the mind.

Being young is not only prevalent in the way college students act, but also in how they look. Just walking between classes is like being among a sea of children who have their shoes untied and bookbag straps on both shoulders. They have bounces in their steps and a rhythm on their handshakes that just aren't seen as often in a grown-up society.

This is not to say that childishness ends after college.

I'll always remember playing my father in air hockey. It was comical watching him transform into a child who was concerned about winning a frivolous game.

Too bad I whipped him.

Nonetheless, the sight was comforting. I'm always concerned about having to grow up sometime, and it's good to know I'll always retain at least a little bit of my childhood.

But for now I'm not willing to give any of it up. I have too many comic books to read, too many episodes of "Thundercats" to watch and too many girls to hit.

Architect bridging gap between separate worlds of architecture, art

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

In written descriptions of the process Pablo Picasso and Georges Braque underwent developing cubism, there's always a sense of intimacy that seems lost in the post-modern world.

One wants to believe the two masters eagerly traded criticisms and gossip and consciously understood the importance of their work and its effect on the world.

Art Review

Europe in the early 20th century, at least in the romantic view, was the bustling training grounds of such visionary modernists as Piet Mondrian, Juan Gris and the architect Le Corbusier.

The early modernist notion of bridging the worlds of art and architecture, particularly that of Le Corbusier, was the subject of a lecture by architect and writer Werner Seligmann on Thursday night.

Seligmann developed his argument by beginning with the development of cubism, as a departure from Paul Cezanne's ground-breaking work in perspective and, as Seligmann said, his unity of the canvas through color.

His slide show included examples of the work of two very different artists, Claude Monet and Vincent van Gogh, and their "flattening out" of the canvas. Seligmann pointed out how the textural continuity within a Monet or van Gogh serves to heighten the painting's surface quality — a lessening of the reliance on traditional two-point perspective.

Developing this further, Seligmann discussed the development of cubism, particularly of Braque, and the work of Mondrian — who perhaps has the most in common with Le Corbusier's architecture.

"In architecture, we are dealing not with the flat surfaces, rather we are already confronted with deep space," Seligmann said. "Corbusier tries to flatten out the space."

Seligmann, showing slides of Corbusier's various house projects, described the formal games the architect played with windows and volumes in the interiors, while repeating forms on the exterior surfaces.

"What was missing to him was the format — the surface of the painting," Seligmann said. "In architecture, that is the volume."

In a work like Corbusier's Villa Savoye, the architect plays a game of subtracting and adding forms within a cube — as if he is carving out a solid, Seligmann said.

Seligmann presented a well-honed argument and one that seems quite benign by today's standards, although the punch of Corbusier and the early modernists' works stays fresh. Perhaps the few architecture students in attendance will find inspiration in the development of what was arguably a crowning achievement of this century.

Seligmann said he has found, increasingly, that younger architects are not aware of the relationships between painting and architecture.

Seligmann himself has had a substantial career, having founded his own firm in 1961. He's had teaching positions at the University of Texas at Austin (included in the famed "Texas Rangers" group); the Technische Hochschule, Braunschweig, Germany; and Cornell University.

He received his undergraduate degree from Cornell, having studied with Romaldo Giurgola and Buckminster Fuller. Seligmann is also a fellow of the American Academy in Rome.

Albert pleads guilty to assault; NBC fires him as sportscaster

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Marv Albert's sportscasting career went up in flames Thursday when he was fired by NBC and then quickly resigned from the regional MSG Network four hours after pleading guilty to assault charges.

Albert

NBC said it had stood by its veteran basketball play-by-play man and kept him on the air after being assured by Albert in May that there was no basis to charges he had bitten a woman and forced her into oral sex in a Virginia hotel.

"Today, given Mr. Albert's plea of guilty to assault and battery, NBC terminates its relationship with Marv Albert," the network said in a statement.

Within minutes, Albert resigned from the MSG Network, a cable company for whom he broadcast New York Knicks games.

"I fully understand the position in which the networks found themselves due to my very painful situation," he said.

"In the interest of my family, my friends and my many supporters, I step aside with deep humility and will seek to reconstruct my personal and professional life."

Stung by trial testimony that he was fond of three-way sex, biting and dressing in women's clothing, it was a spectacular and humiliating fall for Albert.

Known for his acerbic wit and arch-broadcasting style, Albert was the voice describing Michael Jordan's string of championships and was a frequent guest showing humorous sports clips on David Letterman's late-night shows.

He had near-legendary status among New York sports fans, where his signature "Yessss!" call followed thousands of New York Knicks baskets for 30 years. He was also a long-time broadcaster for the New York Rangers hockey team.

If the testimony weren't bad enough, there were the tabloid headlines that announced them in New York: "Menage A Marv" and "Marv Wigged Out" — the latter a reference to a surprise witness' testimony Wednesday that his toupee came off when she fought off his advances.

Most broadcasting contracts have "morals clauses" that, at the very least, allow networks to back out of a deal if someone is convicted of a crime, said veteran sports agent Matt Merola.

It's highly unlikely Albert will be able to resurrect his career, said Paul Schulman, who buys network advertising time for corporate clients.

"They stood by him right up until the point at which he pleaded guilty," Schulman said.

"I don't think he can ask an employer to do any more than that."

and/or kill somebody," he said.

Bishop said that last spring, UPC staff had to run to cover up the many items of equipment.

Nathan Goodell, freshman undecided, said he was happy with the choice of films. He said he has seen both movies, and has seen "Animal House" probably six times. He would like to see the film again next year, but said he would like it if the drive-in were more than once a year.

Sun Technical shows about 150 movies a year, Feller said. He has never seen "Three Amigos!" but he said "Animal House" is a favorite at colleges. Other favorites are "Grease," "The Blues Brothers" and "Ferris Bueller's Day Off."

Feller said one school canceled "Animal House" because greek students complained that it portrays fraternities in a bad light.

At another college, members of two fraternities started fighting in the parking lot.

Twenty-five or 30 men from each fraternity were throwing bottles and punching each other, he said. The police stopped that presentation midway.

Bishop said attendance at the event was good, though not as good as last spring. He said last spring's event was on a weekend, which probably improved attendance.

Cats vow not to overlook Bowling Green

▶ COACH BILL SNYDER SAYS the Cats should expect a tough match.

SUN DEE MILLS
sports editor

K-State fans are buzzing about next week's K-State and Nebraska matchup, but Coach Bill Snyder refuses to look that far ahead.

"Our focus is on Bowling Green," Snyder said. "Not so we can do something down the road, but so we can do something right now."

And that something involves taking care of the Wildcats' third Mid-American Conference opponent, the Bowling Green Falcons. The Falcons are 2-0 in the MAC, 2-2 overall, and Snyder noted many challenging facets in their type of football team.

"Bowling Green is a team that plays so fundamentally sound and with good technique," Snyder said. "If you get lulled to sleep, it can get you into trouble."

Much like what happened to the Cats in the Ohio game Sept. 13.

The players say they've learned a valuable lesson from the narrow 23-20 victory.

"It makes us realize that we're not where we need to be yet," senior linebacker Travis Ochs said. "It was a good eye-opener."

And so the work began to fix all the things Snyder and the team were unhappy with after Ohio.

"Our quarterbacks are passing the ball more accurately, our wide receivers catch the ball better and are running more accurate passing routes," Snyder said. "The offensive line is practicing with a greater sense of urgency. Our cover guys are better. I think we made some strides there."

All in all, Snyder called the week tolerable.

"I thought we became a better football team over the course of the week," Snyder said. "We worked on a variety of fundamentals and prepared for a variety of different opponents, settling in (Monday) with Bowling Green."

And as far as a newly developed quarterback controversy is concerned, Snyder said he'd like to see them all play at some point on Saturday. But Snyder said he still believed Michael Bishop is the one.

"If he's still got confidence in me as a coach, then I've got confidence in him as a quarterback," Snyder said.

Bishop said the week's practices have given the players a renewed confidence boost as well.

"It's going to be a different game Saturday," Bishop said. "We're ready to show everybody that we're ready to play now."

Preparing for the Falcons required different tactics than the Ohio preparation did, Snyder said.

"They're almost a 50/50 team in terms of running and passing the ball," he said.

"It's not like last week's preparation."

Snyder mentioned the Falcons' special teams will be of concern to the Cats.

"They are excellent in regards to kick-off returns," Snyder said. "Their punter can really boom the ball to gain them excellent field position."

Falcon coach Gary Blackney is the 13th winningest active coach in NCAA Division-I football and has coached his team in three close games this season. Of their four games, three were decided by seven points or less.

Ochs said the eye-opening Ohio game will keep the Cats on their toes against the Falcons.

"We know that if we play like that again, we won't be winning any more ball games," he said.

Big 12 season opens against 2 of conference's best teams

SAM FELSENFELD
staff reporter

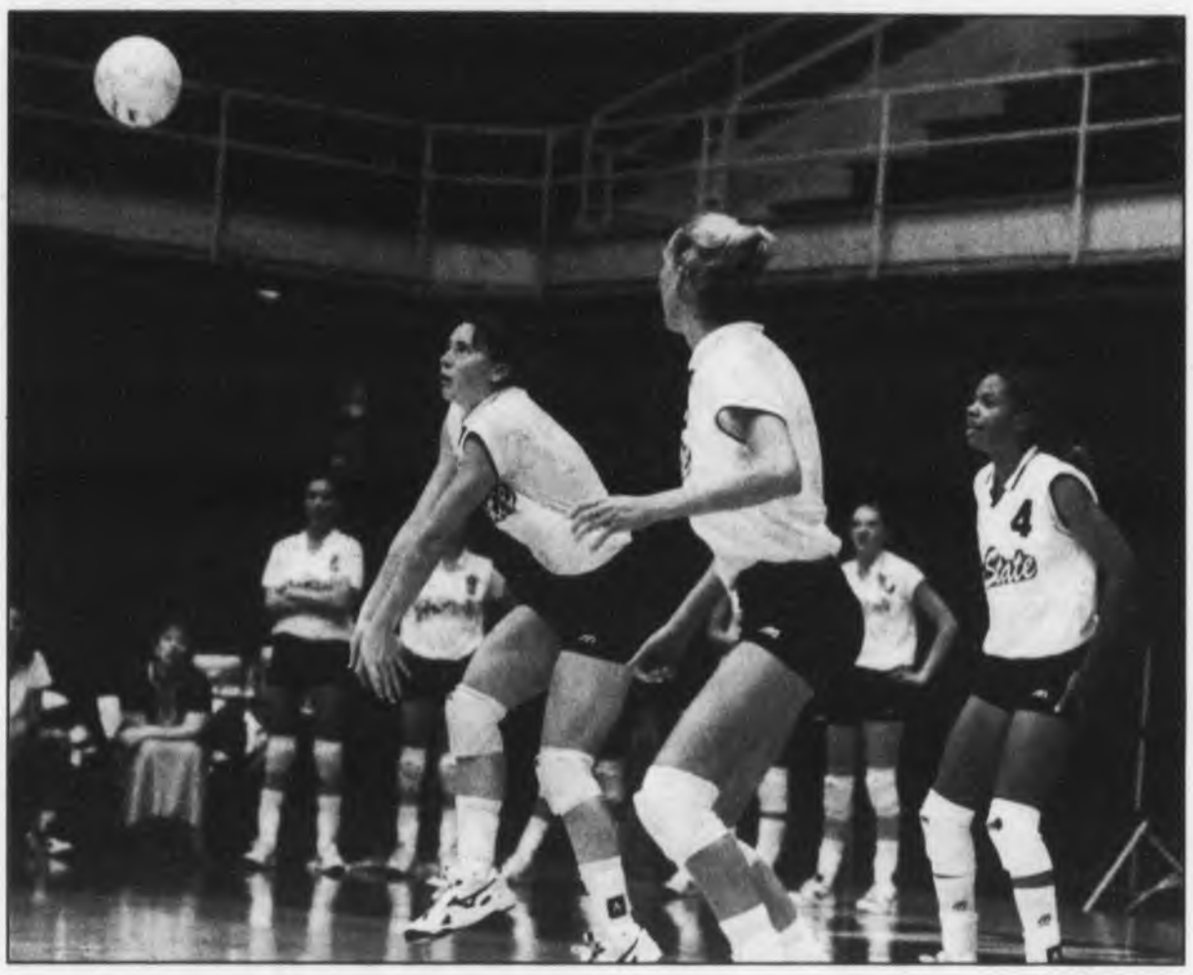
The K-State volleyball team has done well so far this season.

The Wildcats are 8-3, off to the fifth-best start in school history. They're 3-0 at home, and in those matches, they've only lost one game.

But when they take the court tonight against Colorado, they'll be 0-0. Tonight's match against the Buffaloes opens up 1997 Big 12 Conference play for K-State.

While the Cats have put up impressive numbers so far, they have struggled against top opponents. K-State has played twice against ranked teams, losing to then-No. 11 Hawaii 3-0 and to No. 20 Maryland 3-1.

And this weekend won't be any easier. After playing No. 24 Colorado tonight, the Cats will face fifth-ranked Nebraska Saturday. While the Buffaloes will force K-State to play at the top of its game, beating the Cornhuskers will be nearly impossible, judging by past results.



The Cats have never beaten Nebraska, losing all 55 matches between the two schools.

Still, the Cats are confident they can play good volleyball, as they did when they advanced to the second round of the NCAA tournament last season.

"I think we're improving," junior middle blocker Val Wieck said. "If you look at us at the beginning of preseason and now, we're still going upward. We're making a lot of improvements, and that's a good sign."

Also, based on past results, beating Nebraska is realistic, even though it's never happened. Last season, the Cats took a 2-1 lead before losing the final two games to the Huskers in Lincoln, Neb.

But K-State coach Jim McLaughlin won't talk about the Nebraska match until the Cats are finished with Colorado tonight. He refuses to let the Cats overlook the Buffaloes, especially considering the strength of Colorado.

IVAN KOZAR/Collegian

OUTSIDE HITTER Dawn Cady, left, and the Wildcats begin Big 12 play tonight at home against Colorado.

"We know Colorado is complete, we know they have five seniors, and we know they're winning a lot of matches. We just know they're a good team," he said. "We know they're pretty complete, they're poised, and they're pretty spontaneous. If we don't put the ball away, they're going to put it back over the net, and usually with an attack. We're not going to see many free balls against Colorado."

Colorado will bring a 4-4 record into Ahearn Field House tonight. Its record is not as impressive as other schools in the top 25, nor is it as impressive as K-State's. But its play impresses McLaughlin, and he won't take the Buffaloes lightly.

"They can operate in system, out of system, and they can dig balls and get swings. They're good. They just play good volleyball," he said.

"It's fun to watch them play. But I'll tell you what — we block better than they do, and I think we have equal firepower."

McLaughlin said the Cats are working on their defense-to-offense transition, as well as cutting down on mistakes. K-State was able to get by with sloppy play against several non-conference opponents. In Big 12 play, though, that won't work.

McLaughlin expects the Cats to play a solid game if they want to challenge Colorado.

"I think it's going to come down to who serves and passes, over time, better," he said. "I think that's what's going to happen, because they have a pretty good offense, but we have a good offense, too."

Golf team wants scores to keep falling after year's best finish

JESS C. LOUK
staff writer

The K-State men's golf team is going in the right direction.

Down, as in lower scores, Coach Tim Norris said.

In this week's Kansas Invitational at Alvamar Golf Club in Lawrence, the Wildcats finished eighth in a field of 17 teams.

This may be a middle-of-the-road score, but it is a vast improvement over what the Cats did in their last outing.

In the first tournament of the year, the Falcon Cross Creek Invitational in Colorado Springs, Colo., the Cats finished 20th in a 24-team field. They did not have a golfer finish in the top 50.

"The tournament at KU was much more representative of the talent on this team," Norris said. "I think the players are hungry for success, and I think we're going to have a good year."

Norris said a good year for his team will entail qualifying for the regional tournament from the Cats' district.

As for the first tournament of the year, the results can be attributed to poor playing conditions.

"The playing conditions were very difficult on that mountain terrain," Norris said. "It was really the climate that kept us from not scoring, or scoring where we like to."

On the first day of the Kansas Invitational, Brian Racette shot a career low 4-under-par 68 and led the tournament after the first day of play. During the next two days, Racette shot rounds of 75 and 76 to finish in a three-way tie for ninth.

"Brian is definitely pulling his weight," Norris said.

"Anytime in competitive team golf you have two golfers finish in the top 10, you are going to finish well."

Racette's previous low score came in Colorado Springs when he shot 73. Norris said he was the last Wildcat golfer to qualify for that tournament.

The Cats' next tournament will be Sunday and Monday at the Illinois State University Golf Course in Normal, Ill. If the Cats finish well, they will be taking another step toward qualifying for regionals. Two teams playing from K-State's district in the tournament are Arkansas State and Iowa State.

There are 20 teams in the Cats' district, only seven of which will qualify for regionals. Oklahoma and Oklahoma State are in the district and are continually ranked in the top 20, Norris said.

"We are definitely going to have to play better for our goal to be realized," Norris. "That's my job. I have to find the best five golfers for each tournament, and get them all playing well at the same time."

Hockey season almost here, this puck fan offers take on NHL's best and worst for '97-'98

VIEWPOINT

DAN MERKER

DAN MERKER is a senior in computer science. You can send your e-mail comments to Dan at dmerker@ksu.edu.

Believe it or not, hockey season is nearly upon us again. I, for one, am ecstatic. It seems like forever since Steve Yzerman hoisted the Stanley Cup over his head even though it was less than four months ago.

The season has snuck up even on me, the truest of hockey fans, because of everything else that has been going on — the end of baseball season, the Ryder Cup, and professional and college football.

But come Wednesday, my sanity will be back, because I can finally watch hockey again. This season, there is a bonus. National Hockey League players will play in the Winter Olympics for the first time in Nagano, Japan. I can't wait for that.

Here is a quick look at the 1997-98 hockey season.

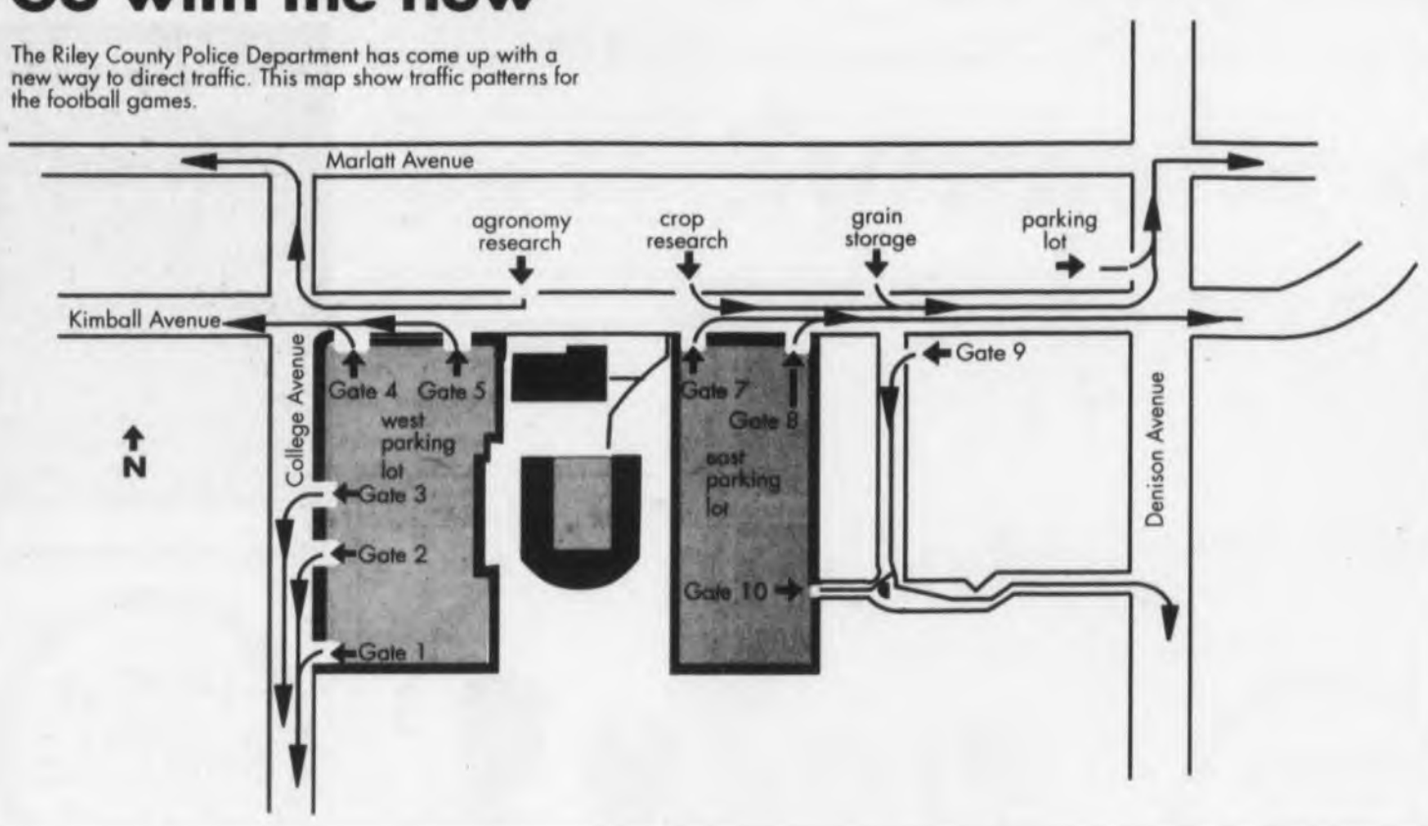
In the Atlantic Division, the best division in hockey, toughness might be the most important trait for a team. New Jersey is outstanding defensively, which makes up for an offense that is less than spectacular. Martin Brodeur could be the best backstop in the league.

Philadelphia has something to prove to the hockey world, despite reaching the Stanley Cup finals in the spring. It was embarrassed by Detroit and should start this season on a mission. The New York Rangers and Florida will both try to adjust to life without their former captains, Mark Messier and Brian Skrudland, respectively. Both teams will miss their toughness and leadership and will be worse without them. The Rangers picked up Skrudland, but nobody can replace Messier, a former demigod in New York.

Washington should be in contention if it can escape injuries. For the Capitals, that's a big if. The New York Islanders have a lot of potentially good players, which could mean a lot of unexpected wins. But it will most likely result in another rebuilding year. Tampa Bay is not too bad but outclassed in this tough division.

In the Northeast Division, Mario Lemieux's retirement is welcome everywhere except in Pittsburgh. The Penguins are the best in this mediocre-at-best division. Jaromir Jagr will have to prove he deserves the moniker of "Mario Jr." Buffalo will go as far as reigning MVP goalie Dominik Hasek will take them. Ottawa has a lot of young talent and a great coach and will be pretty good. Montreal and Boston are once-proud franchises that will not be good. The Hartford Whalers are now the Carolina Hurricanes, but nobody outside of Connecticut has noticed. The Hurricane's plays won't turn heads.

Detroit has all the tools to defend its Stanley Cup and should be on top of the Central Division. Phoenix has more talent than most teams in the league, and this should be the year the Coyotes jell as a team. The Dallas Stars will fall back down to earth. The team is not as good as it looked last season. Chicago, St. Louis and Toronto will each battle for the final playoff spot in the Western Conference.



The Colorado Avalanche, 1996 Stanley Cup Champion, will dominate the Pacific Division. The Mighty Ducks of Anaheim, led by Paul Kariya and Teemu Selanne, might be more fun to watch than any other team in the league. Vancouver is going to be better with the addition of Messier but is still not deep enough to compete with the elite teams. Edmonton has loads of talent and will take people by surprise, just like it did to Dallas in the playoffs last year. Calgary is rebuilding, but might still be good enough to squeak into the playoffs. Los Angeles added Jozef Stumpel so the rest of the league better watch out. That crying you'll hear between Wednesday and mid-April will be me, watching my favorite team, the San Jose Sharks, finish dead-last in the league. The addition of playoff MVP goalie Mike Vernon will mean little, because the team in front of him is atrocious. He will have more losses by Dec. 1 than he had all of last season, including the playoffs.

That should be enough information to follow the NHL with some background knowledge.

While enjoying NHL action this winter, keep in mind John Cullen and Vladimir Konstantinov. Cullen is fighting for his life, battling leukemia, and Konstantinov is still recovering from near-fatal injuries from a car accident this summer. This puts in perspective how unimportant the games we watch really are.

Teen pleads guilty to rape, beating

ASSOCIATED PRESS

EVERETT, Wash. — A teen-ager pleaded guilty to raping and fatally beating a 12-year-old baby sitter over the weekend because he hopes to get out of prison some day, his mother said.

"It was his idea" to enter the surprise plea, Sharon Dodge told the Seattle Post-Intelligencer. "He wanted to get out. He may be 50 or 60 years old, but he would still be out."

David Dodge, 17, stunned friends and prosecutors Wednesday by pleading guilty as an adult to first-degree murder, rape and burglary charges in the death of Ashley Jones. Prosecutors said they will ask for the maximum penalty, life in prison, when he is sentenced Nov. 3. He could be eligible for parole, because the charge was not aggravated first-degree murder. He would not have been eligible for the death penalty because of his age. The minimum penalty for first-degree murder is 20 years in prison. Standard-range sentences for the rape and burglary counts could add up to an additional 30 years or more.

"I've never seen this happen before," Snohomish County Deputy Prosecutor James Townsend said. Townsend said he had no indication beforehand that Dodge intended to plead guilty, and that no negotiations toward a plea bargain had taken place.

Dodge's public defender, Neal Friedman, told the judge that he had discussed the situation thoroughly with Dodge and that he believed pleading guilty was in Dodge's best interest.

"I am convinced that he understands the rights that he gives up by entering this plea of guilty," Friedman said.

Friends said Dodge had problems — multiple juvenile convictions for burglary — but no reputation for violence.

"He did it, but it's not the David I know," said Kelli Clark, 15, expressing the sentiments of many Camano Island teens at his arraignment. "Everybody knew him. He was a good guy, but he's got a bad side."

"I would never have thought in the worst day of my whole life that he could be capable of it," Jeff Hoffman, 18, and friend of Dodge, said.

Ashley was watching five young children Saturday night at a neighbor's house in Stanwood, about 40 miles north of Seattle.

Dodge entered through an unlocked door, bludgeoned the girl with a piece of wood and raped her while she was unconscious, prosecutors said.

Little Rock bomb scare spurs FBI investigation into incident

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — Trucks similar to the one used in the Oklahoma City bombing were parked outside a pair of abortion clinics today, touching off bomb scares just before President Clinton spoke across town. No explosives were found.

Dogs sniffed out suspected explosive devices in the trucks, which blocked access to the clinics, but the city's bomb crew said all it found was road flare residue in the trucks' tool boxes.

"This was some type of protest," bomb crew chief Bernie Sherwood said. "They wanted to take the concern that we had with the Oklahoma City bombing and the Ryder truck and maximize the threat for a protest."

Police said the same person rented both trucks. An investigation is continuing.

A truck laden with fertilizer and fuel exploded outside the Oklahoma City federal building April 19, 1995, killing 168.

The abortion clinics are three and seven miles away from Central High School, where Clinton honored the first black students to attend the school 40 years ago.

The president appeared at the high school at 10:15 a.m. — five minutes after he was scheduled to speak. It wasn't immediately clear if the delay was caused by the discoveries.

Bill McEntire, a firefighter at the scene of one clinic, said emergency crews were called in after someone blocked traffic and ran away.

Some nearby buildings had to be evacuated.

Forensics takes 3rd in first competion

APRYL MATHES

K-State's forensics team couldn't talk its way out of this one.

The team kicked off its season last weekend, taking third place overall in the Hill Country Swing held at Southwest Texas state and the University of Austin.

However, forensics coach Craig Brown said the team has a few more hills to climb before it realizes its full potential.

"We did solid, but we could have and should have done better," Brown said. "We weren't as polished as we could have been."

Aaron Breitenbach, senior in speech and political science, agreed with Brown.

"We did OK for our first tournament, but I think we need to be more prepared for our events in the future," he said.

However, the squad has maintained a compelling national reputation throughout the past several years.

"Within the last six years, we've always finished in the top five, except for one year when we finished 11th," Brown said.

One of the reasons for the impressive record, Brown said, is the consistent aptitude of the incoming freshman class.

"I have to give a lot of credit to solid Kansas high school forensics," Brown said. "We get a lot of people out of high school who have a lot of talent."

Another influential factor is the tremendous support from the university.

"We get more and better support from this university, psychologically and financially, than any other college," Brown said.

However, having such superior backing is not without its difficulties.

"Coaches will say how things suck at their schools, and I just have to keep my mouth shut, which isn't always easy for me," Brown said.

However, Brown said it is easy for him to talk about the merits of the team.

"We've got a lot of talent, and quite a few young pups that have stepped up to the challenge," Brown said. "We've got a dedicated squad, and they're pretty good about being smart with what they do."

Because of the recent graduation of five team participants, commitment is especially important.

"Some of our seniors and leaders graduated this year, so we've got a little smaller squad," Breitenbach said.

Brown agreed this year is a transitional one for the squad.

"You have to ask yourself, are we rebuilding or reloading? And if it's rebuilding, you're in trouble," he said.

Luckily, Breitenbach said, it doesn't look like the team will be in a dilemma.

"I don't think it's about rebuilding. It's about setting different goals," Breitenbach said.

Finishing in the top five, qualifying 15 people for nationals and competing with Bradley University are among some of his goals for the year, Brown said.

Bradley's team has finished first in eight of the past 20 years.

License center to open Tuesday in Village Plaza

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

Manhattan now has two centers where driver's licenses can be renewed. One will be moving to the west end of town next Tuesday.

The current exam station at 455 E. Poyntz Ave. will close today at 3 p.m. The new location, to open Sept. 30, is in Village Plaza at 3003 Anderson Ave., Suite 1001-AB.

Sheila Walker, Kansas Department of Revenue representative, said the new location has more space. The old location serviced an average of 150 customers daily.

Walker said the decision of the Riley County Treasurer's Office, which began renewing licenses last week, to make the move of the main center to the west side of town was a wise one.

"Given that we have people from Fort Riley who have to come here to renew their licenses, the new office is more accessible to students and others in Manhattan, too," she said.

Business hours remain the same for the new center: 7 a.m. to 5:45 p.m. Tuesday through Friday. The phone number is still (785) 537-2140.

Will Isabella trade her virginity for her brother's life? That's her dilemma as she pleads to save her brother, who has been sentenced to death for impregnating his unmarried lover. It may sound like an R-rated movie, but this, folks, is Shakespeare.
Measure for Measure is one of Shakespeare's most well-crafted plays, but is often overlooked in favor of the more famous tragedies, histories, and comedies. By today's standards it is a "dark" comedy that probes both the relationship of law and morality in the state and human behavior under stress. Don't miss out when Actors from the London Stage perform this morally intriguing play.

MIXING ART, THE INTERNET AND ONLINE JOURNALISM

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

MATT BECHTOLD, junior in print journalism and English, operates an online magazine out of his apartment. The magazine, Synapsis, showcases local artists.

Online magazine highlights art scene

▶ Look it up in the World Wide Web. Synapsis can be found at www.synapsis.net

BRADNI HERTIG
staff reporter

The white-walled room that houses Matt Bechtold's computer is a sharp contrast to the futuristic-looking creation he produces with delicate taps on the keyboard and maneuvering of the mouse.

Bechtold, junior in print journalism and English, spends what he describes as too much time putting Synapsis, an online magazine highlighting the arts in Manhattan, on the Internet.

Synapsis offers reviews and general information about area restaurants, music, arts, literature, games and upcoming events.

This is Bechtold's third attempt at putting a magazine online. Rather than letting discouragement get the better of him, he said he used what he learned from the first two tries to make the third try work.

Feedback, the magazine Bechtold originally tried to put online, was the predecessor to Synapsis.

"I was fresh out of high school and a little naive," Bechtold said.

The basic ideas are still in use for Synapsis, but Feedback was attempted in 1993, which wasn't the right time in computers for it to really work, he said.

Bechtold does most of the design and hypertext mark-up language, or HTML, from his apartment to put the magazine online. He describes himself as a self-taught designer, having taken no art or design classes, except for those he has taken in the journalism sequence.

Bechtold said he tries to go beyond what has become the traditional print design and do something out of the ordinary, gathering ideas from magazines such as Axcess.

"It's a little crazy at times," he said.

The Synapsis staff consists of several regular writers, but there's always room for more, Bechtold said.

The writers work on a voluntary basis, but Bechtold said he likes to compensate them in some way. He is unable to pay everyone in cash because of Synapsis' small budget.

When Streetside Records placed an ad, they paid in gift coins, and Bechtold then gave the coins to the the writers.

"I like to take care of the writers," he said.

The ad sales Synapsis garners support the entire publication. Bechtold said he keeps his ad prices in comparison to other publications because he wants to offer support to the arts industry. However, he said he's not hindered by his low rates.

"It's enough to keep the boat afloat," he said.

Stephen Elder, owner of the Gamer, met Bechtold at Bob's Diner, where area writers meet to write and talk. Elder has a few pieces of his writing featured in the literature department of Synapsis. Each month, a chapter of a novel he wrote is published in Synapsis.

"I thought it was a good way for me to get my foot in the door and get some feedback," he said.

Elder said Bechtold was instrumental in motivating him and other writers and artists to get their material done.

"He pushes us. Actually, you could call him a slave driver — he's really good at it, and that's what he needs to do," Elder said.

Elder also plans to buy ad space in Synapsis for the Gamer.

"I figured that would be a good way for me to put money back into it to support Matt," he said.

Bechtold said he's looking to expand his coverage to Lawrence soon. After that, he'd like to continue adding Midwestern cities to the coverage area without sacrificing the amount of coverage.

One of Bechtold's goals is to pay for the rest of his education with the magazine, something he thinks he could easily do someday. He said it might even be something he could turn into a career.

Elder said he thinks the magazine has a lot of potential for success.

"For that kind of media to reach out to people, I think it's really great," Elder said.

Punk-rock horror, 3rd-wave debut make good music

GROOVIE GHOULIES
Graveyard Girlfriend Lookout!

Music Review

Everyone thinks of the Misfits when it comes to horror-themed punk rock. Forget that. Give me the Groovie Ghoulies any day of the week.

These three freaks, now featuring Dan Panic of Screeching Weasel and Riverdales fame on drums, have released their Halloween treat for you. And it's on pumpkin-orange vinyl.

The sound quality is far better on this release than it has been on past efforts, due mainly to the production by Mass Giorgini. Giorgini has produced such punk luminaries as the Queers, Screeching Weasel and Squirtgun.

"Graveyard Girlfriend" occupies the A side of this platter, and it's a good one.

Its fun, pop-punk sound mixed with a garage-rock sensibility is a blast to listen to.

Its light horror-themed lyrics about hanging with your girlfriend in a cemetery are very true to the Ghoulies' past work. I love it.

The double B side features a couple of oldies covers, which it has also done in the past. The Ghoulies have covered such bands as the Rolling Stones, Herman's Hermits and the Monkees.

On this single, the Ghoulies tackle Chuck Berry's "Trick Or Treat" and Daniel Johnston's "Deviltown." Their cover of "Trick Or Treat" is vaguely similar to the original but they punk it up and add that Groovie Ghoulies charm to it.

Oh yeah, there are strategically placed hand claps throughout the song as well. "Deviltown" is far too short. It blazes by before you know it.

Celebrate Halloween in the best way I know ho:. With Kepi, Roach and Panic.

THE ROYALTIES
Welcome To New Jersey
Self-released

Ska is firmly implanted in its third wave of popularity, and The Royalties are playing a distinctly third-wave sound.

It's not overly traditional a la Hepcat or the Slackers, but it's not ska-punk like the Mighty Mighty Bosstones or Less Than Jake. It's fast and upbeat but doesn't have distortion on the guitars.

The A side track is "SSR DIY," which is about them keeping their music DIY, or Do It Yourself.

The horn riffs are really good. They're not overly simple, which is a plus. If the horn players can play well, then let them. And the Royalties do just that.

The only complaint I have about this song is the keyboard is mixed way too high in the sound. It's louder than everything else, which detracts from the overall sound.

The B side contains "Avoid the Crime," which seems to be another song about keeping their music real to themselves.

The saxophone and trombone solos on this song are exceptional. They're not too flashy.

The vocals on "Avoid the Crime" got a little grating at points, but not enough to make me yank the needle off the record mid-song.

The Royalties are a young band. This is a good debut effort, but it is obvious it is a new band. After it matures and grows as a band, it will be interesting to see what the band is capable of producing.

other organizations.

"It's about learning who the resources are and making contacts," English said.

The SAT constitution's mission is: "To promote awareness and responsibility on a variety of social issues affecting Kansas State University students. The SAT is committed to increasing the probability for academic and social success throughout the development and maintenance of a campus environment that supports and encourages responsible decision-making and safe behavior."

Heidi Eichman, SAT president and sophomore in horticultural therapy, said the main purpose of the organization is to promote educational programming.

"I like to see students being educated on critical collegiate issues," Eichman said.

Some of the issues SAT will focus on during its meetings this semester are rape and sexual assault, alcohol abuse, stress and relaxation, depression and suicide, sex, and AIDS and STDs. The goals of SAT are to do one program per month and educate students on critical issues through programs, fliers and articles.

Eichman said she keeps a file that contains statistics on critical collegiate issues all students should be concerned about.

She said these facts will be used on fliers to get students' attention about the organization and to promote awareness of the real issues.

Todd Clark, resident-life coordinator for Haymaker Hall, is the new adviser of SAT. His role is to help guide the organization from a professional point of view, Eichman said. With his experience as the regional chair for the National Association of College and University Residence Halls, Clark is familiar with the issues and concerns that students who live in the residence halls face, English said.

SAT has 23 members and has been registered with University Activities Board as a campus organization for the past two years, but it is still operating in conjunction with ARH. It is in transition to distinguish itself as a separate organization.

Membership is open to any students enrolled at K-State who are interested in educating themselves and others.

CLINTON

turned back, presidential spokesman Mike McCurry said.

One of the nine, Minnijean Brown Trickey, a social worker in Ontario, became overwhelmed and reached out emotionally to Clinton and Huckabee for comfort. "It was pretty strong symbolism," she said of the president's gesture.

Another member of the nine, Terrence Roberts, said, "The whole affair was a hopeful sign for this country's future."

Forty years ago Thursday, President Eisenhower ordered the Army's 101st Airborne Division to Little Rock to escort blacks into classes after then-Gov. Orval Faubus mobilized the Arkansas National Guard to block integration. It was the first real test of the government's willingness to use force to implement the 1954 Supreme Court's Brown vs. Board of Education decision outlawing school segregation.

Nightly newscasts showed scenes of whites cursing blacks and spitting on them. Eisenhower said the specter of "mob rule" in Little Rock menaced America's safety and allowed "gloating" Communists abroad to undermine U.S. prestige and influence.

The story of the Little Rock Nine has been told in films, books and documentaries. Their names appear in history books, noted Ernie Green, Central's first black graduate and now an investment executive.

If one young person is inspired by their story, "then the Little Rock Nine become the Little Rock 10, the 10 a hundred, the 10,000, the 10 million," Green said.

"Today, it's 40 years later. I wouldn't take anything for our journey," Green said.

First lady Hillary Rodham Clinton recalled she had received an early lesson in courage as she watched the crisis on television "from my suburb outside of Chicago where I went to schools that were all white, where I lived with only white people."

The president said, "Too many Americans of all races have actually begun to give up on the idea of integration and the search for common ground."

2000 project," Vulgamore said.

Vision 2000 is the renovation and new addition project the fraternity has been working on. While members have pledged monetary donations, alumni support is also critical, Vulgamore said.

Another reason for the work on the application was the accountability of officers and the motivation it gave the chapter.

"It created a sense of responsibility. Officers had to organize and present their office. It really helped our overall motivation as a chapter and built confidence in our officers," Vulgamore said.

The DUs also won several other awards at the annual conference. Other received awards included the Best Financial Management Program, Most Outstanding Service Project and an Honorable Mention for Outstanding Membership Education.

Their philanthropy project, the Women of K-State Calendar, is well-known in Manhattan, but few know about the extra time put into the service project, Leahy said.

DU also won the Most Outstanding Service Project award for work with the Villages of Topeka, a home for abused children. During the year, DU members spend time with children, donate the money from the calendar to the home and spend their own money to provide Christmas gifts for children, Leahy said.

Even with all the effort and time put into winning the trophy, members will only get to enjoy its physical presence for a year.

"It has the names of all the other chapters who've won it engraved on it. But it's a traveling trophy, so we'll have to give it back if we don't win it again next year," Leahy said.

"Things went very well, and in the past we've had problems with attendance," said Sarah Basore, Mortar Board member and senior in dietetics. "This year, I had a lot of people come up and talk to me afterwards and tell me they were pleased with the student attendance and questions they presented."

Regents propose tuition increase

▶ BUDGET TO INCLUDE PLANS for improved technology.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The proposed Kansas Board of Regents budget for fiscal year 1999 includes a 2.8 percent tuition increase and a dollar-per-credit-hour plan to address technology issues.

The 2.8 percent increase is a base increase that doesn't specifically address one issue. It would increase regents-wide tuition revenues by $4.5 million and is a quasi-cost-of-living increase.

The one-dollar-per-credit-hour plan, which is to be matched with two dollars by the legislature, would acknowledge technology equipment matters at K-State.

Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance, said, "If the $2 match was not forthcoming, the board would reconsider the tuition increase."

During fall '96, the university undertook a comprehensive survey to technology deficiencies showing a need of more than $54 million. This number was broken down to $14 million for undergraduate instruction, $23 million for graduate/research equipment and $17 million for support areas.

The $14 million would go to such things as equipping electronic classrooms, outfitting the Farrell Library with more workstations, providing more computers for campus computing labs and equipment for science laboratories.

For the 1998 fiscal year, the regents recommended $12 million for technology issues for all institutions, but Gov. Bill Graves and the legislature substantially decreased the amount in the final budget.

The current proposal would amount to nearly $1.5 million for K-State's technology enhancement, which breaks down to $483,000 from tuition and $966,000 from the state. Administrators are hopeful, but not entirely confident, the two-for-one proposal will fly.

John Struve, director of the budget office, said the first clue to the proposals status will be the Kansas Division of Budget's recommendations Nov. 15.

"I don't expect to see that included," Struve said. "Traditionally, the Division of Budget recommendations are the lowest in the budget cycle, but gives the governor something to improve upon."

The budget, including that of K-State, is in the hands of the Kansas Division of Budget, which will make its recommendations to Graves on Nov. 15.

Graves will then craft his own version of the budget and present it to the legislature and the public during the first week of the new session, which begins in January. After the Budget Division makes its recommendations, the regents do have an appeal process where they can meet with the governor before he makes his recommendations.

K-State's budget approval also includes a general program enhancement, which addresses distance-learning programs and information technology in the instructional environment.

"The chances of this one being successful are not very good," Struve said.

The original request amounted to $773,000, but the figure was split to address graduate teaching/research assistants' health care. The enhancement is now $417,836 and the graduate teaching assistant health care plan

Business cited for violations of liquor laws

▶ FRATERNITY'S CATERER No. 1 on agency's list for underage drinking.

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

A Lawrence caterer hired for at least one Manhattan-area party leads the list of liquor license violators released by Alcoholic Beverage Control late last week.

BJ's Catering, Lawrence, along with Lucky BrewGrille, TW Longhorn's and Silverado Saloon, all of Manhattan, were found in violation of their licenses during an Aug. 23 statewide, liquor-enforcement effort by ABC.

Sheila Walker, ABC public information officer, said charges against the businesses are pending.

"I'm confident that these administrative charges will be filed soon," she said.

ABC agents targeted five Kansas college towns during the August operation, and most of the violations they found in the Manhattan area were against BJ's Catering. Eleven charges of allowing possession of alcohol by an underage person and two charges of failing to notify ABC of a catered event with alcohol are pending against the caterer.

Walker, who could not reach the investigating agents late Friday afternoon, said two charges of not notifying ABC of a catered event were most likely a sign that BJ's was caught violating its license at two separate parties. Until those locations are released, Walker said there is no way to know how many of BJ's violations were from which party.

A BJ's spokesman, who would not give his name, said his business catered a party for the Sigma Nu fraternity Aug. 23. The spokesman did not release the location of a possible second event on the weekend in question and said he didn't know anything about the violations.

"We did the party, but I have no record of the allegations or whatever you're saying. I haven't received anything from Alcohol Beverage Control," he said.

That may be true, Walker said, but her agency still plans to file administrative charges. License holders usually aren't notified of their violations until the charges are actually filed, she said.

Ryan Kerschen, vice president of internal affairs for Interfraternity Council, said ABC agents weren't the only ones who found problems with how the Sigma Nu party was operated. Members of the Social Responsibility Committee, which enforces the Greek Affairs alcohol policy, also found violations of their policy at the Sigma Nu party, Kerschen said.

"They (BJ's employees) weren't checking IDs correctly at the door. Half the time they weren't even bothering. The party ran long, also. BJ's kept serving after the time that they had registered with us," he said.

Regardless of who made the mistakes, Kerschen said the SRC policy holds the fraternity ultimately responsible.

"In something like that where a fraternity or sorority hires a caterer, we still have to look at that as an employer-type relationship. Even though they hired someone else to do something for them, we still hold the chapter responsible for what goes on," he said. "If someone like BJ's is messing up, we still look at that as the responsibility of the chapter."

BJ's employees weren't the only ones making mistakes at the Sigma Nu event, however, Kerschen said. SRC members found other violations by the fraternity itself. They were mostly minor, though, he said.

"Basically it was just things that happened because of their ignorance to the policy. They weren't quite sure how to run it right," Kerschen said.

When asked if the Sigma Nu house was fined for its violations, Kerschen said yes, but would not release the amounts of the fines.

"I don't think that should be public," he said.

Sigma Nu President John Pope also refused comment on his fraternity's violations, saying that the issue has been resolved.

"As far as I'm concerned, it's been taken care of, and I don't want

ROARING TWENTIES THEME BRINGS FARRELL LIBRARY'S APPROACHING FINAL DAYS TO A CLOSE WITH GALA

Farrell's Final Fling

STORY BY LESLIE NACHTRAB

Authentic Roaring Twenties costumes, a 1920s car at the entrance and people dancing the Charleston to swinging 1920's tunes were all part of Saturday night's fund-raising event for Farrell Library.

The Friends of the Libraries' annual gala dinner entertained nearly 200 people as it celebrated "Farrell's Final Fling" from 7 to 11 p.m. in the Hemisphere and Great rooms of the library.

The library will be dedicated as Hale Library on Oct. 5.

"The celebration is the last tribute to Farrell," said Jan Crow, director of public relations and marketing for the libraries.

Karen Rogers, committee chair for Friends of the Libraries, said the 1920s theme was chosen because Farrell was dedicated in 1927.

"We thought it would be fun to celebrate the old with the new," Rogers said. "The new building is truly beautiful art, both inside and out. It has to be one of the greatest landmark pieces of work in the state, and it's right here at the university."

Friends of the Libraries hoped to raise between $7,000 and $10,000 from the event. Anyone could attend who wished. People who were not members of Friends of the Libraries could purchase a ticket for $50.

Rogers said her committee tried its best to make sure the evening was an authentic one.

Costumes from the 1920s were borrowed from K-State's Clothing and Textile costume collection to decorate the library. They were also loaned a 1920s car, which they placed at the entrance to the building as a surprise to guests.

Hors d'oeuvres were served in the Hemisphere Room, which was renamed Hernando's Hideaway for the evening, as guests had to knock on the door three times before entering.

The dinner and dancing part of the evening took place in the Great Room, located on the library's third floor. The Vaughn Bolton Orchestra provided 1920s music.

Guests were encouraged to dress in Roaring Twenties attire.

Old IDs to be void beginning Oct. 13

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

Students who procrastinate won't be able to work out or check out library books starting Oct. 13. That is, if they don't go the Union ID Center and get their new student IDs.

Kerri Falletti, receptionist for Recreational Services, said the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex still has about four or five students an hour coming in who haven't got their new IDs yet. This makes up about 10 percent of students wanting to use the Rec, Falletti said.

"There's not too many old IDs coming in," Falletti said.

Jack Thoman, assistant director of the K-State Student Union, said there are several locations on campus that will be affected by the Oct. 13 deadline, but the main facilities affected will be the Rec Complex and Farrell Library.

"You will need to get your card, or you won't get in the Rec after this date," Thoman said.

Other high-traffic areas affected by the ID card change include Lafene Health Center, the K-State Student Union, Parking Services, Telecommunications and Quick Cats.

The residence halls have already been completely converted to the new cards because of access reasons, Thoman said.

Thoman said there might be a rush before the deadline because 4,000-5,000 students and faculty members haven't had their pictures taken and switched over to the new ID cards.

He said an estimated 20,000 photographs have been taken for the new ID cards.

DIGEST

NEWSrewind
News Rewind collects the top campus, local, state, national and world news from the past 48 hours. Briefs are collected from wire and staff reports.

Campus phone books go on sale

The temporary excuse of not knowing someone's number will end this week when the K-State campus phone books go on sale.

The campus directories will be available all this week in the free-speech zone outside the K-State Student Union.

Directories will be sold for $3 to students and $4 to faculty, staff and the general public.

"We wanted to make the directory more attractive inside and out," said Marty Goodnight, phone directory manager and senior in advertising. "This way, it will be a more useful publication."

Some of the new aspects of the directory will be a more appealing cover, Goodnight said. Instead of yellow pages the directory will have purple pages. Also included in this year's directory will be e-mail addresses.

"Now that the campus phone books are available, I can call friends that I couldn't have because I didn't have their number," T. J. Trout, junior in feed science, said.

Directories will also be available in Kedzie 103 and the Union Little Theatre.

Local troops leave for Bosnia

On Sunday morning, 33 men and women of the 450th Transportation Battalion unit based in Manhattan left for a 270-day tour of duty in Bosnia. Among those soldiers is Tom Wefald, freshman in hotel and restaurant management and nephew of President Jon Wefald.

Tom Wefald is a food service specialist in the army. He joined the military for the duty and honor to his country as well as the discipline and training. Tom Wefald said he hopes his time overseas goes quickly.

"A positive attitude will make it go a little bit faster," he said.

President Wefald came to see his nephew off.

"He should use it as a learning experience and really get to understand different cultures and religions," President Wefald said. "I know he will probably come back more mature and more ready to go to school."

President Wefald said he is proud of all the K-State students serving in this unit.

The unit will be stationed in Hungary, just outside the Bosnian border.

Death of University of Kansas student ruled 'not suspicious'

LAWRENCE — Autopsy results from a University of Kansas student found dead in her dormitory room show nothing suspicious about the death, a Douglas County coroner said.

But Dr. Erik Mitchell refused to say what caused 18-year-old Angie Griffin's death.

Her body was found Friday morning by her roommate and her roommate's parents in Ellsworth Hall.

A relative of the victim said Griffin had been diagnosed with mononucleosis, but Mitchell would not confirm that report.

"There's nothing suspicious, nothing anybody else should be worried about," Mitchell said Saturday.

"I'm very uncomfortable about going into anyone's personal history. The important part is that there's nothing that would endanger anyone else."

Mitchell said all autopsy results are not complete, but added they would not be released.

Funeral arrangements are pending, but services will held in Liberal, Kan.

Rescue workers look for bodies of 234 crash victims in Indonesia

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Rescue workers coughing on forest fire smoke used vines to clamber up a jungle slope on the island of Sumatra on Saturday, picking through trees and probing mud for the remains of 234 people killed in Indonesia's worst air crash.

After more than 24 hours of searching the smoldering, ash-covered ground, rescuers had not found the flight data and cockpit voice recorders that could indicate whether the haze from hundreds of fires contributed to the disaster.

The Garuda Airlines A300B4 Airbus crashed Friday afternoon while attempting to land at the Sumatra island city of Medan, an area clouded with smoke from hundreds of smoldering forest fires. The blazes were set weeks ago by plantations and timber companies to clear land.

Workers on Saturday scrambled up trees and sifted through black ash in search of remains. Some body parts were fished out of the mud.

Education majors get head start teaching in local schools

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

Secondary education majors are gaining practical experience before student teaching.

A professional developmental program was formed with the Manhattan-area middle and high schools to help K-State students develop field experience.

The program is in its second year and has provided a continuing base of practical experience for the education majors involved.

This program enables future teachers to get more classroom experience and to have constant contact with the classroom in an attempt to make the switch to student teaching easier.

Larry Scharmann, secondary education department chair, said he considers this a partnership between the area high schools and the college that will build trust and help secondary education majors develop hands-on field experience.

Scharmann said this type of program has been available to elementary education majors for almost seven years. The difference is that the elementary program puts college students in one classroom with the same students all day teaching various subjects.

The secondary program puts college students with different students and subjects throughout the day. Because the situations are different, a different model was created for secondary education.

Sarah Garner, senior in secondary education, said the students will also participate in group teaching. Each group of four students will teach together and create a lesson plan for the students.

"I think it's really good, it'll give us a little taste of teaching before we jump into student teaching," Garner said.

There are four phases secondary education majors must complete.

The first phase is observing. During this phase, the student observes in professional classrooms and then decides whether to pursue teaching as a career.

The second phase involves learning core teaching skills, educational psychology and how to instruct exceptional students in secondary schools. This phase has not been implemented and will be piloted at the two Manhattan middle schools later this semester.

The third step is rigid in content areas. It involves a block II lab and content-area methods. During this phase, students help professional teachers prepare of lesson plans and group discussion.

The final phase deals with multicultural education and interpersonal relationships. This phase is also called student teaching.

Scharmann said the three areas of method-based courses this program involves are math, science and foreign languages.

Cindy McQueen, professional development school director and instructional facilitator at Manhattan High West, said the program helps both the teacher and the students grow.

McQueen said there have been situations where college students have stepped forward and made suggestions which have enhanced classroom situations for the high school students.

She said the college students were a benefit because they help out when a group of students need extra help.

"The smaller size of the group benefits Manhattan students because they get more attention," McQueen said.

She said although the program is new, it is evolving and it's an innovation.

"It's something I think K-State's known for," McQueen said.

Scharmann said there are close to 60 students who will participate in the program this semester.

Little Apple Festival lures diverse crowds

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff reporter

The Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation brought the medieval and pioneer eras to City Park on Saturday and Sunday for the 22nd-annual Little Apple Festival.

The festival, which featured demonstrations ranging from jousting to how to bake pies on coals, also featured arts and crafts displays and sales.

The Mountain Man Camp from Salina, Kan., was one of the parts of the festival. The group, called the Prairie Longrifles, is a free trappers organization that attends shows and competitions while trading among themselves.

Luke Long, Salina resident and member of the Prairie Longrifles, said each person in the group has a knack for making certain things. When they get together, Long said, they are able to share ideas and specialties.

While Long said he enjoys talking to the festival's visitors, he said his favorite part is camping in the park overnight.

"I like the quietness and getting back to the old way of doing things," he said. "It's laid back and away from the hustle and bustle. If I don't get something done here, then I don't care."

> We wanted something more for the kids since most people will bring their children when they come out.

> recreation supervisor for parks and recreation

The Mountain Man Camp has been participating in the festival for eight years, Long said.

Doug and Verleta Myers, Manhattan residents, were part of the pioneer folklife exhibit with their Native American crafts. Verleta Myers specializes in making dream catchers.

"I'm part Indian, and I love making things," Myers said. "I just can't sit still, so I have to do this. We enjoy the Indian heritage, too."

A change to this year's festival was the expansion of the children's area.

"We wanted to add more to the show," said Ann Pavlik, recreation supervisor for the parks and recreation. "We have the craft market, which is basically for adults. We wanted something more for the kids since most people will bring their children when they come out."

The festival, which annually draws a crowd of 10,000 people during the two days, attracts people from further than Manhattan.

Kathleen Androes, of Newton, Kan., decided to make the drive to Manhattan with her husband after her sister recommended the festival.

"It's just a nice time of year to be here doing this," Androes said. "I'm just really enjoying this."

Committee finalizes campus wish list

STUDENT SENATE WILL VOTE THURSDAY ON PROPOSALS TO INCREASE CAMPUS SAFETY

ZACH VADER
staff reporter

The Governmental Relations Committee dotted the i's and crossed the t's Sunday for resolutions to increase campus safety and beautify the campus.

The resolutions, which are part of the City/University Projects Fund, will be voted on Thursday by Student Senate. If approved by Senate, the recommendations will be sent to K-State administrators and finally the Manhattan City Commission.

A stoplight and a pedestrian crosswalk at Thurston Street and North Manhattan Avenue was named as the first priority by the committee.

Lisa Donaldson, senior in social work, said she favored the proposed changes.

"The situation is very dangerous on that street," Donaldson said. "We would like to get some sort of petition and protest going to make sure that something is done for the safety of the students."

Donaldson said it would be great if volunteers would stage a walk on Thurston Street and Manhattan Avenue to make sure the city sees there is a need for a change.

Patrick Carney, chairman of the committee, encouraged Donaldson to take action.

"Just because we are involved now does not mean that students shouldn't voice their concerns," Carney said. "Make a little noise."

More lighting and crosswalks in the Jardine area, as well as beautification projects for K-State, including additional benches, the replacement of dead trees and the creation of fountains, were also discussed as part of the recommendation.

The committee said it is opposed to a proposed roundabout at North Manhattan Avenue and Claflin Road. The roundabout is a joint project between the city of Manhattan and the Kansas Department of Transportation. KDOT would pay for 90 percent of the $250,000 cost.

Carney said he has contacted many living organizations in the area that are opposed to a roundabout.

"That area has about 15 to 20 percent of our students living there," Carney said. "I have gotten formal oppositions for the roundabout plan from Alpha Tau Omega through the residence halls."

Carney said he sent a copy of an article from the Manhattan Mercury and a letter to the living organizations in the area and waited a week for a response.

Registrar needs updated information to keep tabs on students

Take a moment when you pick up the new Campus Directory. Flip through it.

Look up your name.

Don't freak out when you see the shocking truth.

The Collegian can already hear the complaints ranging from "This isn't my phone number!" to "I don't live there anymore."

There's a good reason your directory listing might not be accurate.

Every year, Student Publications Inc. gathers a list of phone numbers, names, addresses, years and majors from the Office of the Registrar.

Student Publications has to believe these entries are accurate.

If the entries are not, it could be your fault.

If you move or change your phone number, you should contact the registrar's office and fill out the necessary paperwork to get an accurate listing.

It takes less than 10 minutes and could result in more than having your friends know what your phone number really is.

For example, with graduation notices, invoices and refund checks making paths to mailboxes across town, an accurate address could alleviate a delay in receiving vital information.

The only way the registrar's office could make the directory changes easier would involve using the World Wide Web.

Imagine the ease of going to the university white pages, calling up your name and filing a change using a UNIX-account, password-protected e-mail.

While you're checking out your current address and phone number, it might also be a good time to update that permanent address if your parents have moved or if you no longer use that address.

A few moments checking those important facts associated with your name could make for fewer problems down the line and prevent you from having to call up all of your new friends to tell them what your number and address really should be.

Then again, maybe you are trying to avoid that financial aid check refund.

Exploring why K-State really is one of the best-kept secrets in the nation

My leg was shaking as I glanced around the office.

That's a habit of mine. I was sitting there, notebook open, waiting for the woman in front of me to find what she was looking for, and I was shaking my leg to pass the time.

I couldn't understand how anyone could find anything in that work space. Papers littered every part of the desk, except for one section where cutouts from the New Yorker magazine showed through the desk's acrylic coating. A pin which proudly proclaimed "Save Public TV" leaned against the computer, next to which sat a box full of those old, 5 1/4-inch magnetic disks. Against the back wall sat a typewriter, plastic dust-protector sliding off in a ponderous descent to the floor.

VIEWPOINT

JON KURCHE

JON KURCHE is a freshman in physics. You can send e-mail to Jon at jsk6609@ksu.edu

Virtually every other inch of available space in the office was filled with papers, files and pamphlets. Their stacks dominated one wall and had begun to take over the window ledge and the top of the file cabinets in the back corner.

The only harbor from the deluge of paper was a group of plants in the window, but the picture they presented was more of a surrealistic tableau of a city siege than that of office harmony with which plants are usually associated.

"Here it is," said Judith Zivanovic, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and director of the Arts and Sciences Honors Program, as she pulled a sheet of paper out of a folder with a flourish and put it in my hand.

I was in the office because I had planned on writing a column on the honors program at K-State. I wanted the whole campus to know all about the special things which go on in the Honors College. I wanted to remind everybody about all the scholars — the Rhodes, the Trumans, the Marshalls, the Goldwaters, the Madisons, the Fulbrights. I wanted to remind everyone we've been called "the Harvard of the Midwest." I wanted to do this so I could remind others about how great K-State is.

As I sat in the office, however, I realized greater things were afoot.

I wanted to do this so I could remind myself.

I was lapsing into the throes of melancholy which ultimately consume any freshman. My thoughts were paralyzing. Thoughts of being overwhelmed. Thoughts that I wasn't doing enough on campus. That I wasn't doing enough for my fraternity. I compromised too much in coming here. I was an academic failure. On and on, twisting in an ever-widening, downward spiral.

Or, something like that. I panicked and decided I had to find out what makes K-State so great to so many people — especially when it isn't in any of the college-rating books. It isn't listed in U.S. News and World Report's annual review of colleges. It isn't even mentioned in the Kansas City Star unless they are talking about the Big 12. The University of Kansas is mentioned routinely and not just during basketball season.

My leg was still shaking. Zivanovic seated herself and began staring intently at her computer, her purple and gold jewelry making a clinking sound as it crashed against her purple skirt and jacket. My eyes drifted to a pile of bags in one corner, stacked haphazardly up to the window sill. There must have been a small fortune invested in all that luggage. Looking upward, I caught sight of a book — "Between Languages and Cultures." I asked her about it.

"I'm doing a paper on multilingual theater in Canada," Zivanovic said. "It's fascinating. They have way more than we do in the U.S. in terms of bilingual and multilingual theater."

Being in this office was akin to stepping into an intellectual "Warp Zone" in Super Mario Brothers. She began handing me papers she kept about the honors program. One of these papers was a flier advertising a satellite seminar in which honors students can enroll in a class, in this case the colloquium "Resolving Disputes in a Contentious World," to be taught by professors around the nation via satellite.

Honors newsletters advertising research work and presentations by honors undergraduate students, like John Herbert's application of Rayleigh-Schrodinger perturbation theory to evaluate the quantum-mechanical wave functions of polyatomic molecules. Like Joanna Rothwell's presentation of "The Dynamics of Structural Adjustment in Nigeria and Ghana: An Evaluation." Dozens of students, all undergrads, giving lectures, receiving awards, taking cutting edge classes, doing internships. How is this possible?

"That happens because of the faculty. We have a tremendous infrastructure here that a lot of people don't know about until they get involved," Zivanovic said. "We have faculty that are willing to spend all kinds of time helping students."

KRIS EMMONS/Collegian

I remember my first impressions of K-State. I came for Shawnee County senior day, despite the fact that I'm from Johnson County. I remember Pat Bosco, associate vice president for Institutional Advancement and dean of student life, warmly greeting me. I remember many faculty members taking time out of their busy schedules and going out of their way to talk to me. At that point I was still just considering K-State.

I remember applying immediately via the Internet when I got home.

I could feel myself getting closer to the truth.

That will have to wait until next Monday.

Campus parking problems caused by students too lazy to walk to class

Editor,

I would like to make a few comments in reference to the small comic at the bottom of the opinion page Thursday.

Half the parking problems at K-State lie within the fact that students drive to campus from Osage or Ratone streets. Kansas is far from matching Colorado in the fitness craze.

When you live less than a mile and a half from campus, lace up your sneakers and do your deteriorating, young heart some good — walk.

Also, the student parking lot on Claflin Road or the lot across the street from Ahearn Field House are rarely full.

When you claim there are not enough parking spots, you mean there are not enough spots three steps from your classes.

Furthermore, when students discuss the need for a parking garage, we lose sight of the fact that a parking garage would raise the small tuition that all of us complain about.

If you looked at universities outside Kansas, you would realize many students walk to class because parking permits are meant for faculty. This is true even at schools with higher tuition — but that is a whole other topic.

TIPPING THE SCALES

Extra pounds cause fear of being trapped in fat body

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

MARY RENEE SMITH is a sophomore in speech. You can send e-mail to Mary at mojo@ksu.edu

The scale is now my enemy. Big Macs mock me. Tiramisu taunts me.

I've never been one of those people who obsessed about their weight. I never really had to worry about it. Three years ago I was 22 years old, had two kids and weighed 98 pounds soaking wet. Not anymore. A few days ago a doctor told me I am now 30 pounds over my ideal weight.

Suddenly I am scared.

It didn't happen overnight. I gained the proverbial "freshman fifteen" and the "sophomore fifteen" and began the "junior fifteen" a bit early. The weight has snowballed. The more I weigh, the faster I gain even more.

The charts all the doctors seem to be using these days say a woman my height (5'1") should ideally weigh 105 pounds. Yeah, and ideally I'd be making $500 a column and driving a decent car.

Throughout my life I have been able to eat whatever I want, whenever I want and as much as I want. I had days when I was too busy to eat and days when I ate everything in sight. Suddenly everything that goes into my body is under scrutiny.

I don't look really overweight. That actually makes it worse. Not that I want a ton of sympathy; I just want people to stop saying I look fine. My mother says I carry the extra weight well. My friends say I look healthy. My boyfriend says I look great, but that is kind of his job. But none of them have to step on that scale with me. None of them have to squeeze into my jeans I fit into just a month ago.

There are a few theories about the reason for my weight gain. The most obvious is my eating habits. I am busy and eat more than my share of fast food. And as for exercise, I think running is nature's way of telling you to buy a car. But some other more interesting rationale for my weight gain have recently come to light.

The most interesting theory is perhaps I am gaining weight because I am not out on the prowl anymore. I have settled into a stable relationship and my body figures it can relax and hang out — all over.

Everyone has heard of love handles. Great. It's a lose-lose situation. Sleep around, get an STD. Practice monogamy, get overweight. I don't quite buy that. I have seen skinny married people. I have seen overweight people who are very sociable.

Then there is the age-old excuse — age. Everyone gains a little flesh as they get older. No one is going to look like they did when they did when they were 18. I know that. I don't mind getting older. I'm only 25, that happy age where I am old enough to do whatever I want but still young enough to have time to make up for the mistakes I am going to make.

Some wonderful things come with age. Breasts for example. I refuse to believe that part of the natural process of aging involves having "cottage-cheese" thighs.

I have never been a vain person. I am the first to admit I was an incredibly ugly teenager. At 13, I had frizzy hair, was flat-chested and had the fashion sense of a junior high science teacher. I have never quite outgrown that adolescent dissatisfaction with my body. This is something altogether different. Now I am actually frightened. I don't know how to stop this from happening to me.

It isn't like I didn't notice I was gaining a bit of poundage. Every semester I have had to buy a bigger size of jeans. Each summer for the past two years I have had to buy new clothes. I knew I was getting a bit heavier. But, I hadn't really begun to worry about it.

Now I can see them in the mirror, those 15 to 30 pounds I would have to lose to be in that ideal range again. What if I can't do it? What if I get trapped in a fat body? Will it still be me inside? Does everybody fear this, or am I completely nuts?

I've made an appointment with the dietitian at Lafene Student Health Center. I'm going to try to do this without going off the deep end. I have a newfound respect for people who have lost weight.

I don't have to look like Kate Moss. I don't have to wear a size three ever again. I just want to feel like myself again. I want to be able to wear jeans and breathe at the same time. I want to be able to walk past a mirror without cringing or crying.

Full Moon Festival celebrates Vietnamese heritage, culture

SANDY DAVIS
staff writer

A flower dance and native songs were used to celebrate Vietnamese heritage at the International Student Center Saturday night for Tet Trung Thu, or the Vietnamese Full Moon Festival.

The Full Moon Festival is a celebration for children in Vietnam.

"Tet Trung Thu is comparable to Halloween, which is why we celebrate it this time of the year," said Nga Vo, president of the Vietnamese Student Association and senior in biology.

Traditionally, children dress in costumes and sing songs in the streets to receive candy and other treats.

Vo said the actual festival took place Sept. 16 in Vietnam.

The festival is to remind Vietnamese students and area families about who they are and where they come from.

After a traditional candle and incense lighting ceremony, Vo thanked Vietnamese families in Manhattan for helping to keep their heritage alive so far away from Vietnam.

Area resident Thac Pham spoke briefly to the students, telling them that they are lucky to be here at K-State for the opportunities available, and that he hopes they will return to Vietnam with their knowledge and help rebuild the country.

VSA vice president Trinh Bui, senior in accounting, and Tuan Ngo, junior in architecture, served as masters of ceremony for the festival. Bui spoke in Vietnamese, and Ngo translated into English. Most of the festivities were conducted in Vietnamese.

After the opening speeches, the VSA gave a feast that included rice, egg rolls, chicken and Vietnamese desserts. The food was prepared by Vietnamese families in Manhattan.

When the feast concluded, the entertainment started.

VSA members performed songs, dances and skits for the audience, including a flower dance, a children's lantern dance and a skit called "The Art of Cooking Noodles" that had Ngo in an apron and tool belt.

The entertainment was interactive; the audience laughed, clapped and talked throughout the performances. Each act ended to thunderous applause and cheers.

The final performance involved University of Kansas students, along with K-State VSA members dancing to Will Smith's "Men in Black."

Judy Lynch, VSA's new adviser, said VSA gives Vietnamese students a place to find support and camaraderie from other Vietnamese students. The VSA is active with Vietnamese families in Manhattan.

Vo said the festival was a way to bring the Vietnamese in Manhattan together.

"It's a chance for the VSA members to promote efforts of Vietnamese awareness," Vo said.

"I had a flapper dress made for this, right down to the purple fringe," Rogers said.

Even with the celebration dinner happening on the same day as a K-State home football game, organizers said they saw this as a positive thing.

"We were actually fortunate that there is a game," Karen McCulloh, assistant to the dean, said.

"We were hoping to make this a Kansas-wide event, not just a local event. With people already coming in for the football game, it makes it easy for them to be able to show up here," she said.

Will Isabella trade her virginity for her brother's life? That's her dilemma as she pleads to save her brother, who has been sentenced to death for impregnating his unmarried lover. It may sound like an R-rated movie, but this, folks, is Shakespeare.
Measure for Measure is one of Shakespeare's most well-crafted plays, but is often overlooked in favor of the more famous tragedies, histories, and comedies. By today's standards it is a "dark" comedy that probes both the relationship of law and morality in the state and human behavior under stress. Don't miss out when Actors from the London Stage perform this morally intriguing play.

EUROPE RETAINS RYDER CUP

SOTOGRANDE, Spain — Europe withstood a late rally by the United States on Sunday to win the Ryder Cup, taking golf's most-prized team trophy for the fifth time in the past seven competitions.

With a massive five-point lead going into the final 12 singles matches, Europe clinched at least a tie when Bernhard Langer parred the 17th hole to beat Brad Faxon 2 and 1.

That gave the Europeans 14 points — enough to retain the Cup they won two years ago at Oak Hill in Rochester, N.Y.

The Europeans needed another half-point to win the Cup outright — and they finally got it when Colin Montgomerie, in a driving rainstorm, halved his match with Scott Hoch to make the final score 14 1/2-13 1/2.

With thousands of fans packed in the fairway and around the green, Montgomerie, who only needed a tap-in for his par, conceded a long par putt to Hoch. That halved the hole and the match.

The underdog Europeans won the Cup against a star-laden American team that included three of this year's four major winners — Tiger Woods (Masters), Justin Leonard (British Open) and Davis Love III (PGA) — and eight of the world's top-13 ranked players.

"It's been a great day for European golf," Langer said. "Many people said we couldn't beat the Americans. On paper we looked like the underdog, but we knew we had the 12 best players in Europe on our side."

What shaped up as a European runaway on Sunday morning turned into a tight contest in the afternoon as the Americans staged a spirited rally by winning seven of the singles matches. The Europeans won three, and two matches were halved.

"I knew the Americans were injured in the heart and they came out this morning with the idea of playing hard, and they nearly took the Cup away from us," Ballesteros said.

The Americans would have needed the biggest comeback in the 70-year history of the event to win, and they came close.

"It seems like every two years we see something (exciting) like this," U.S. captain Tom Kite said. "We had a great shot at winning. We knew we had to play well and we did play well. The guys performed admirably. We just came up short."

McGWIRE ENDS WITH 58

ST. LOUIS — Even though Roger Maris was out of reach, Mark McGwire made a little history.

McGwire hit his 58th home run, tying him for the most by a right-handed batter, in the St. Louis Cardinals' season-ending, 2-1 victory over the Chicago Cubs on Sunday.

McGwire, who hit two home runs Saturday, tied the mark set in 1932 by Jimmie Foxx and equaled in 1938 by Hank Greenberg in 1938. Only Maris, who had 61 in 1961, and Babe Ruth, who had 60 in 1927 and 59 in 1921, have hit more.

CHIEFS WIN IN OVERTIME

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Chiefs, overloaded with 12 new starters, finally played the mistake-filled game everybody's been waiting for.

And they still won.

Pete Stoyanvich kicked a 41-yard field goal with 1:56 left in overtime as the Chiefs overcame a slew of errors and Elvis Grbac's three interceptions to beat Seattle 20-17 Sunday.

Jerome Woods intercepted Warren Moon's pass and returned it 13 yards to midfield. Nine plays later, Kansas City (4-1) had a four-game winning streak and its 12th victory in the last 13 meetings with the Seahawks (2-3).

Seattle's Todd Peterson, as time expired in regulation, missed wide left on a 58-yard field goal.

For much of the second half, the Seahawks had wide receiver Joey Galloway and running back Chris Warren out with injuries.

The last home game against Ohio on Sept. 13 saw the Wildcats go into the locker room with a 23-point lead — a lead that shrank to three points by the game's end.

Saturday against Bowling Green, the Cats went into halftime with a 20-point lead. But this week, the team dominated both halves of the ball game to shut out the Falcons, 58-0.

"I don't wish that on any other football team," said head coach Bill Snyder. "I'm pleased with the way our youngsters played."

Cat statistics jump off the page: A total of 638 offensive yards marks a new school record. The Cats posted 429 yards rushing, with a career-high, 163-yard contribution by senior running back Eric Hickson.

"Our No. 1 concern was to run the ball," said Jeremy Martin, junior right guard. "We wanted to go out and finish things. We wanted to go out there and be more rush-oriented."

Hickson alone racked up 89 rushing yards in the first quarter on the way to his personal record.

"Eric had a great day. All our running backs did," Martin added. "We had some mistakes, but we did some good things, too."

One of those mistakes occurred early in the first half, when junior quarterback Michael Bishop fumbled a ball the Falcons' Letoskey Carey recovered. The Falcons couldn't move the ball forward on the drive, giving up possession in 1:45 while posting -2 yards.

The situation never got better for Bowling Green. The Cats' defense held the Falcons to their own side of the field for every series in the first half. Meanwhile, the Cats' offense had the ball for seven more minutes and put 20 points on the board.

"I think we just concentrated on finishing things," said left tackle Todd Weiner, "finishing drives, finishing blocking, finishing quarters, finishing halves."

Junior fullback Brian Goolsby made his first appearance of the season after being out with an injury. He recorded an 11-yard run at the beginning of the second quarter, finishing the game with four rushes for 31 yards.

"I think he's important," Snyder said of Goolsby. "He can handle all facets of the game. He just has a multitude of talents, and I think he's a well-rounded player."

Two first-half touchdowns, a Mike Lawrence 1-yard run and a Bishop quarterback sneak for one yard, were complimented by two Martin Gramatica field goals for the first-quarter scoring.

The second half, the Cat defense was relentless as they again held the Falcons to their own side of the field.

Posting negative rushing yardage in the third quarter, the Falcons' highest yardage in a series occurred with 10:25 left in the fourth quarter.

The team moved the ball to its own 39-yard line for a 20-yard game-high, but a Cat face-mask penalty gave the Falcons their third first-down of the game.

The Cats went on to accumulate 8 penalties for 58 yards, one of few things about the game Snyder said he was displeased with.

"I'm unhappy about some of the penalties we had," Snyder said. "That's very undisciplined."

Another redshirt came off as true freshman Monty Beisel entered the game in the second half. Beisel recovered a Falcons' fumble that turned into a Cats touchdown on the following drive.

Sophomore quarterback Jonathan Beasley made his first appearance of the game in the last drive of the third quarter. After an unsuccessful option play that cost the Cats four yards, Beasley ran the ball 20 yards and put the team in position for its fourth touchdown of the game.

"I know I did better than last week," Beasley said. "It makes me feel better and it gives me more confidence."

The 5-yard catch by junior wideout Darnell McDonald in the first seconds of the fourth quarter was the first touchdown of McDonald's career.

During the fourth quarter, with the Cats up 44-0, the lineup on the field changed completely. The ball also saw more air time by Beasley's hand, at Snyder's request.

"I told Jonathan that I wanted him to throw the football," Snyder said. "I told him that we'd get some criticism for it, and I told him that I'd take the criticism, because he needs the opportunity to throw the football."

Beasley completed 3-of-3 passes for 67 yards, throwing a 43-yard bomb to Polica Houston for the longest pass in the game. Beasley also posted the longest rush of the game with a 58-yard rush in the fourth quarter.

The Cats face their first Big 12 opponent Saturday when they play at No. 3 Nebraska in Lincoln.

Nebraska squeaks by Cats in 4

SAM FELSENFELD
staff reporter

On Saturday, Nebraska came to town and defeated the Wildcat volleyball team 3-1, improving its all-time record against K-State to 56-0.

But the No. 5 Cornhuskers didn't put on the powerful show the Cats expected.

The Huskers, led by 6-foot-4 all-American outside hitter Lisa Reitsma, normally dominate their opponents with their powerful attack and strong blocking. The Cats were prepared for the challenge, expecting to go heat vs. heat.

And even though they've never beaten Nebraska, the Cats were ready to pick up win No. 1 in front of a school-record 5,036 fans at Ahearn Field House.

"We always come out expecting to win, no matter what team it is," senior setter Devon Ryning said. "I think it would be foolish not to. How could you ever win if you didn't expect to?"

However, the powerful Nebraska squad used finesse to get by K-State, catching the Cats off guard.

"I think what really hurt us was their tips," junior middle blocker Val Wieck said. "That's something that we didn't pick up on. It's something that we've worked on in practice, and it was very frustrating to us because we felt like we should have been picking them up. The blocking was there. We just needed to pick up the tip."

K-State started the match strong, playing Nebraska closely in the first game. The Cats led 6-3, and although the Huskers scored five straight points to take an 8-6 lead, K-State bounced back to win the game 16-14.

Sophomore outside hitter/middle blocker Dawn Cady led the Cats with seven kills and a .308 attack percentage in the game-one win. Defensively, K-State held Reitsma to a .067 attack percentage, combined for four blocks and had 33 digs.

But playing well might have hurt K-State.

"We came in here and we knew their tendencies," Wieck said. "We have certain blocking schemes against each team. I think when we took those away, they had to go to tipping."

Nebraska started tipping more in the second game and defeated K-State 15-7. The Huskers, who had a .167 attack percentage in game one, tipped their way to a .333 showing in game two.

"I think they saw us blocking balls, and I think they were just avoiding the block," K-State coach Jim McLaughlin said.

Still, it was nothing McLaughlin expected.

"I just can't believe they tipped as much as they did," he said. "I really can't."

K-State also lost the third game 15-7.

In game four, the Cats played the Huskers tight again.The Cats struggled to hold a lead.

Maximillan Antig

Visiting pianist hypnotizes audience with intense classical performance

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
staff writer

Review Music

He's a colorful painter who emphasizes color relations in his pictures. He doesn't use paints and brushes when creating a visual scene, but rather, the rondure of his hypnotizing hands and melody.

He wore a conservative suit and burgundy tie with his confident disposition as he approached the grand piano in All Faiths Chapel. There was minimal lighting in the chapel, setting a deep mood as the piano soloist, Maximillan Antig, began performing several selections from Bach, Mozart, Chopin, Ravel and Schumann.

A small crowd of around 60 people, students and general public, scarcely filled the auditorium last Saturday evening to listen to the Filipino classical pianist. Antig began his performance with a Bach selection, "Partita No. 1 in B-flat, Opus 1."

The first "Partita in B-flat" was later expanded by Bach, adding a praeludium as well as two minnets in the middle of the work. The smooth flow and tonality on the piano emphasized Antig's well-organized form and relationship shared between elements as to produce an image. From loud to soft, Antig differentiated the tones and emotion he expressed within every piece.

Antig's second selection was Mozart's "Sonata in B-flat, K. 333," which he joyously played. Resounding chords from the allegro introduced vivid scales into a music-box type sound. The rhythmical combination of successive sounds of various pitch created an air close to chimes. A recapulation finalized Antig's exposition in the sonata, summarizing his harmonious statement.

JEFF COOPER/Collegian

MAXIMILLAN ANTIG performs Saturday night in All Faiths Chapel. Antig performed music by Bach, Chopin and Mozart.

The last movement of the sonata was stated at least three times in the same key, a return was made after the introduction of each subordinate theme. The sounding of notes of a chord in rapid succession almost created a cryptic mood, using abrupt, mysterious short notes. The end of the movement elaborated into a flourished cadenza; Antig successfully introduced the showy passage.

He lightly lifted his body from the piano bench during Chopin's "Opus 49," with intense, yet soft, harp-sounding chords. His fingers created waves of amplified dissonance and harmony, a constant battle between both chordal structures throughout the piece.

Antig took on a whole different mood and tone in both pieces from Ravel. He created raindrop effects that were soothing but often vivid. The pieces required intense movement of his hands. At one part of the music, he put his left hand in his lap, allowing his right hand to lightly play. The pieces faded like waterfalls as he developed a humming sense of closure on a dissonant note.

Antig ended his performance with Schumann's "Carnaval, Opus 9." As a juxtaposed piece, Antig compared and contrasted the tone and operation of the notes and chords. Several times Antig lifted a hand from the piano to wipe the sweat from his head. He pounded carnival-style music that mixed flowing emotional chords while creating a beat with the piano peddle.

The emotion in Antig's movements and sounds painted illusions of his art as a pianist. Antig raised his left arm to his forehead, finishing his innovating performance.

Antig received his bachelor's degree at the University of Santo Tomas in the Philippines, where he became a scholarship student. As a graduate assistant in the United States, Antig completed his master's degree in piano performance at the University of Northern Iowa.

In 1990, he accepted a teaching assistantship at the State University of New York Stony Brook. He has won piano competitions such as the Schubert Club, J. Earl Lee, Music Teachers National Association and the National Music Competitions for Young Artists.

Antig has appeared as a soloist with several orchestras and has attended master classes with noted artists. Aside from his piano performances, he maintains a piano studio in New York City.

Insane Clown Posse sprays concert crowd with generic soda

PHIL KELLUM
staff writer

Review Music

The most dangerous and controversial group in America made a stop in Wichita on Saturday night.

No, not Marilyn Manson. Though you wouldn't have known any different, since there were about 50 kids wearing their T-shirts.

I'm talking about Insane Clown Posse from Detroit.

Its album, "The Great Milenko," was banned by Hollywood Records, a division of Walt Disney, six hours after it was released June 24.

Island Records subsequently won the bidding war for Violent J and Shaggy 2 Dope and signed them for $2.5 million.

About 400 to 500 kids filed into The Forum in Wichita, many showing their love of the group by painting their faces in clown makeup similar to the masked duo.

Many secured their places right in the front of the stage and prepared themselves for the mass chaos soon to ensue.

Violent J introduced the first group, Myzery, from the South Bronx.

Myzery played a very short, 15-minute set and were gone just as fast.

Its style of rap was hard-hitting, yet not gangsta rap. It was still fun. And they got the crowd jumping up and down and participating, which is often rare for an opening act.

The second slot of the evening was occupied by Detroit's House Of Krazees, but they were absent.

At about 9:30, the crowd began chanting "ICP! ICP!" and "Faygo! Faygo!"

Faygo is the brand of generic soda the band douses its crowds in every night. We're talking gallons and gallons of the stuff, folks.

After a pre-recorded intro tape, the black curtain fell to reveal a huge ICP banner across the back of the stage, two funhouse mirrors framed by bones and a large box covered in bones to hold all the bottles of Faygo.

Violent J and Shaggy 2 Dope chained to poles with hoods covering their heads.

They broke free of the chains and hoods and kicked into "Hokus Pokus" from "The Great Milenko."

Violent J was performing with a broken hand from an altercation with several neo-Nazis in San Francisco.

The crowd went absolutely crazy, many begging for Faygo.

ICP didn't keep them from the Faygo. They began spraying the crowd with two-liter bottles of the stuff. I haven't seen such a frenzied crowd in a very long time.

Violent J and Shaggy also got into it by dumping Faygo on themselves and into their dreadlocks.

About 15 minutes into the set, I was calmly watching the show when I was hit in the face by something. I looked down, and it was an empty crate of Faygo made of heavy plastic.

Ouch. That really hurt. But on with the show.

ICP performed songs from all its albums.

During "Chicken Huntin'," which is an anti-racist/redneck song, two guys dressed up as hicks with rebel flag bandannas over their mouths appear on stage and "kill" Violent J and Shaggy 2 Dope with cap guns.

In the following song, "Dead Body Man," they rose from the dead.

When they played "House Of Horrors" from "The Great Milenko," four guys dressed as freaks with hideous masks appeared on stage to dance around.

For "Hellalujah," an anti-televangelist song, Violent J appeared behind a tall pulpit with his face bathed in red light.

One of the best parts of the show was when the band began playing "The Juggla," from its debut album "Carnival of Carnage."

Violent J and Shaggy began spraying each other in Faygo and then started wrestling on stage. Violent J then suplexed Shaggy into the crowd. After getting back onstage, Violent J then backdropped Shaggy into the crowd.

ICP closed with "Pass Me By" off its new album.

Violent J declared he had an announcement to make.

"Wichita is now officially a Clown Town! Are you down with the clown?" he screamed.

The crowd roared back its approval.

"Clown Towns" are the cities where ICP is the most popular. Wichita joins the ranks of Detroit, the hometown of ICP; Cleveland; Chicago; and others.

During "Pass Me By," they broke out huge water guns to spray the crowd with Faygo.

The huge tubs that held the Faygo for the water guns were then dumped onto the crowd.

Violent J brought Myzery back onstage to help spray the crowd in soda.

After the Faygo supply for the evening was exhausted, ICP and Myzery left the stage.

An ICP show is like nothing I have ever seen before. It's more an experience than a show.

And you can bet, I'll see them again when they come back through Kansas.

Statistics professor wins fellowship

LORI GUILFOYLE
staff reporter

Sallie Keller-McNulty, professor in the department of statistics, is the fifth K-State faculty member to be named a fellow of the American Statistical Association.

Keller-McNulty joined Professors Dallas Johnson, George Milliken and John Boyer and Professor Emeritus of statistics Holly Fryer as an ASA fellow when she was honored Aug. 12 during the Joint Statistical Meetings in Anaheim, Calif.

She served as the 1997 overall program chairman for the joint meetings of the American Statistical Association, the International Biometric Society, the Institute of Mathematical Statistics and the Statistical Society of Canada.

"It's a great honor, probably one of the nicest in our profession," Keller-McNulty said. "I was hoping it would happen eventually."

Each year the 18,000-member ASA elects 30 to 40 fellows who are admitted for life. This year, more than 4,000 statisticians were in attendance at the meetings.

The association recognizes full members with established reputations who have made outstanding contributions in some aspect of statistic work with the honorary title of fellow.

"She was elected an ASA fellow for her contributions and dedication to the statistical sciences, for her editorial service, for innovation and excellence in teaching and research, and for professional leadership of the statistics community," said Dallas Johnson, head of the statistics department.

Keller-McNulty came to K-State in 1985 as an assistant professor in the department of statistics. She was promoted to associate professor in 1989 and to full professor in 1996.

Keller-McNulty teaches graduate courses and graduate-level service courses, and she has developed a graduate curriculum in statistical computing. She designed one course in the area of probabilistic system modeling that is a required course for undergraduates majoring in computing and information sciences. She is also co-author with statistics professor James J. Higgins of the textbook, "Introduction to Probability and Systems Modeling."

Keller-McNulty said she likes to get her students to think about how statistics can help them with real problems. When she can, she likes to have open forum classes, where the questions that students ask direct the output of the lecture. She said when they do this they come up with details that would not have come up in a typical lecture.

"My students would say that I am demanding," she said.

In addition to teaching, Keller-McNulty directs the statistical design and analysis unit of K-State's Institute for Social and Behavioral Research. Her research specialty is statistical computing, while much of her focus has been on interdisciplinary problems in computer science, engineering and environmental sciences. She has received research funding from the Department of Energy, the National Science Foundation, the National Security Agency and the U.S. Bureau of the Census.

Her plans are to recruit students into the department as director of graduate studies. She also said she will continue working on national committees and boards, which she said helps shape the face of statistics for our country.

"This field tends to move in step with advances in technology, so there is always some new learning challenge for me," she said.

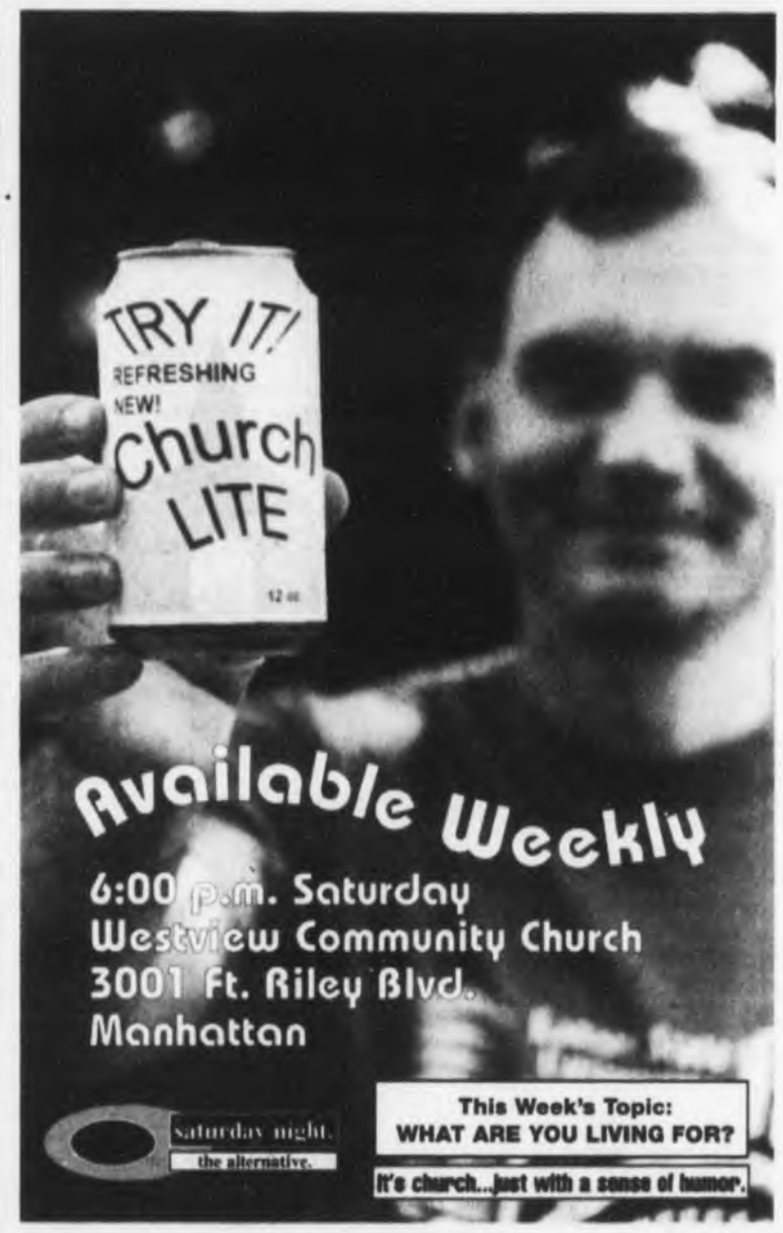
Nebraska gained the lead for good at 10-9, the seventh lead-change of the game. K-State pulled to within 13-11 and later forced side outs on two match points. The Cats eventually lost the game 15-11 as Nebraska closed out the match to improve to 11-2 on the season, 2-0 in Big 12 play.

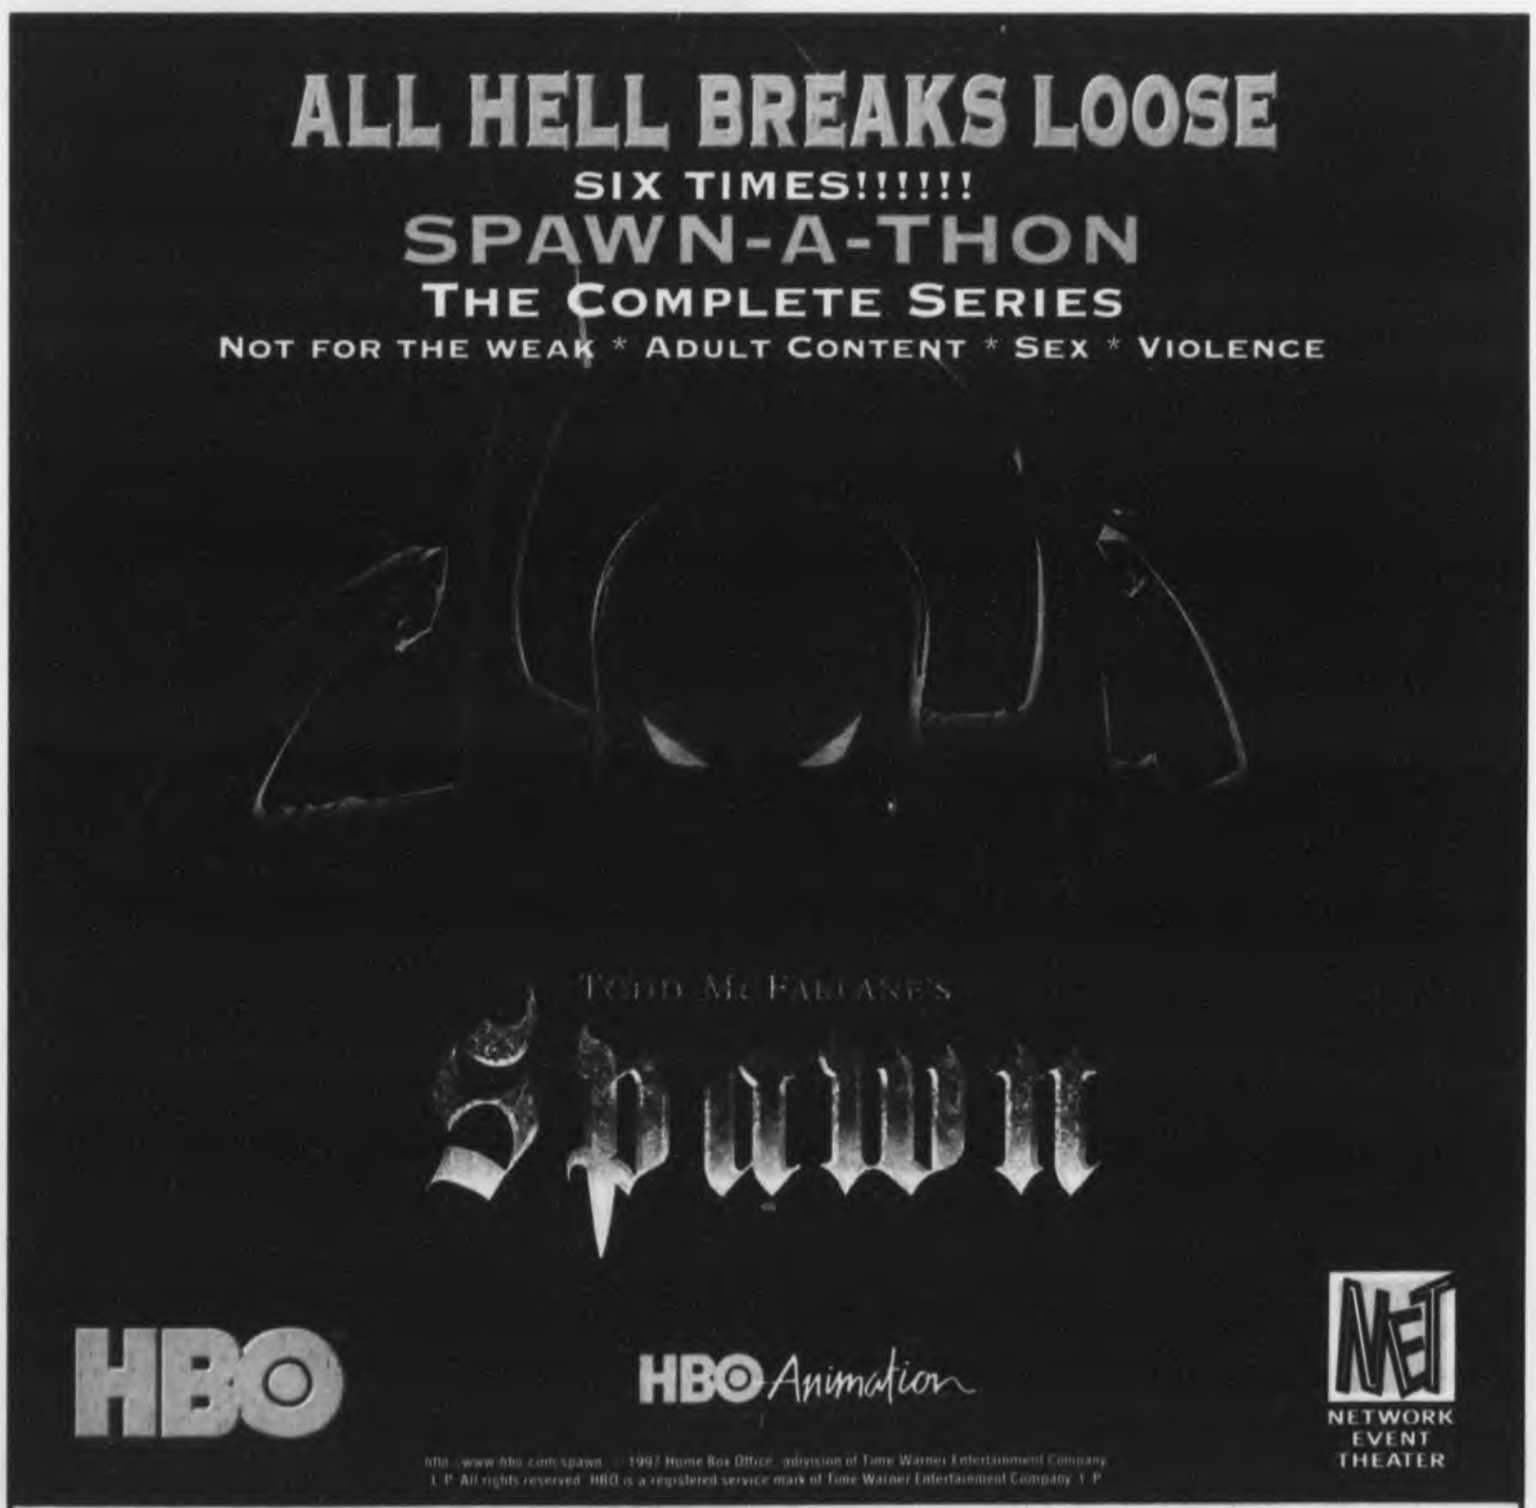
Although K-State is winless after the first weekend of conference play, Ryning, the team captain, isn't worried about the Cats' chances of having a successful year.

"I'm happy with the way the team played, but I'm a little sad because it was at home. We have such wonderful crowds, and I'm scared that the crowd says, 'Oh, what's going on with this team? Are they not as good as last year's?'" she said.

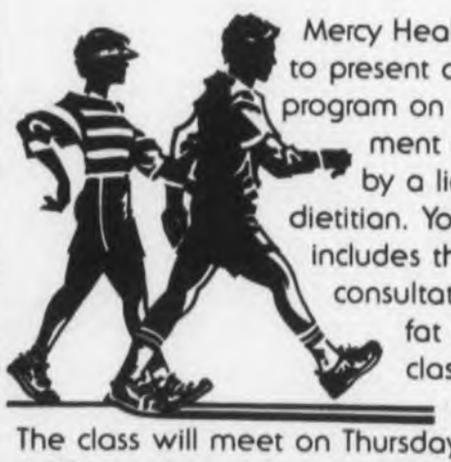


"But that's just not true. We're making great steps, we're making great progression, and I just hope that people stick with us, because I can promise that by the end of the year, we will be very good. We're taking the right steps."

Middle blocker Kelle Branting, a true freshman from North Platte, Neb., got her first chance to play against the Huskers, the powerhouse from her home state.



"It was really exciting," she said. "It was great competition, being our first Big 12 weekend. It was awesome. I can't really describe it."



The Cats return to the court tonight. They will take on the USA National Team at 7 p.m. in Ahearn Field House.

amounts to $355,164.

Struve said the issue must go before the Kansas State Health Care Commission to determine if GTAs qualify and where the rate should be set.

"KU has already committed to it and, by default, we will," Struve said.

If the legislature decides not to fund the request, it would fall on K-State's shoulders.

"We would have to fund it through an internal allocation," Struve said. "In effect, it becomes a university obligation."

Rawson said he hopes the legislature funds the proposal.

"We hope to have the option to offer the health care plan," Rawson said. "Technically speaking, we'd have the ability to decide to fund it or not."

The proposed budget includes a tuition equity funding proposal that would allow K-State to keep 25 percent of all tuition increases. With this year's planned 2.8 percent increase, K-State's returning share would amount to $270,839 for the main campus.

"That would also, on a non-specific basis, be used for academic teaching equipment," Struve said.

Other points in the budget are a 2.5 percent unclassified staff salary increase and a 2.8-percent classified staff salary increase. A 4-percent student salary increase is also included.

Rawson said fiscal year 1999 will also be one of the first years in nearly a decade that the university hasn't opened a new building and won't ask for an increase in building operating expense.

Although it's too early for administrators to judge the legislative climate for the budget, there are some indicators to watch.

Rawson said he will watch the monthly state revenue receipts religiously. He said he sees property tax relief as an important issue confronting any Regents budget increase.

"It's no longer the case that since the state has more money," Rawson said, "because there's great pressure for relief on property taxes."

to drudge it back up. I'd really rather not comment," Pope said.

The ABC license violation charges aren't criminal charges, Walker said. But the four businesses could still face a maximum $1,000 fine for each infraction and have their licenses revoked or temporarily suspended, she said. ABC's director determines the punishment in each case, Walker said, and violators have an opportunity for a hearing before that decision is made.

Solutions to journal shortage posed

SARA BURDETTE
staff reporter

Various fund-raising efforts and reallocating research funds were suggested solutions to the shortage of research journals at Farrell Library during the Privilege Fee Committee meeting Monday.

Some fund-raising ideas included telethons, asking the KSU Alumni Association for donations and reducing the number of journal subscriptions. The last solution was not well-received by the committee.

No proposal has been made, but the committee wants feedback on how to fix the shortage.

The library needs $4 million a year to keep up with the cost of journals, Aaron Otto, committee chairman, said. Otto said the library used to get its journals from nonprofit organizations. But many have become for-profit, which has increased prices.

Patrick Carney, Governmental Relations Committee chair, said 5 percent of alumni donations at the University of Kansas go toward its library. Although K-State's Alumni Association receives more donations than KU's, it is hesitant to give money to Farrell, Carney said.

"If the Alumni Association were to give only 2 percent of their donations, it would be enough to at least maintain, if not expand, the journals," Carney said.

Committee members said they worried about a suggestion to add from $1 to $2 to the student fees per credit hour.

"I think that the journals would benefit graduate students and professors, but I don't think that a privilege fee is beneficial," Jeff Meder, committee member, said. "If they found money to build the castle, they can find money to fill it."

The committee is also concerned with long-term issues, such as continuing fee increases.

"If we keep tuition down but continue to increase privilege fees, it is still money out of the student's pocket," Carney said. "We may look at our student population becoming stagnant or decreasing."

Students are already paying $5 million of privilege fees in the course of 25 years for Farrell's expansion, Otto said. Carney said he felt it was ridiculous to ask for more money when students are already paying so much.

"I don't feel that the library has exhausted all its options yet," Kim Peschka, committee secretary, said. "I do think that it is very important, but I don't think that they should breathe down our backs yet, nor should we let them."

Although committee members said it was important to solve the journal issue, they said raising privilege fees was not necessarily the answer at this point.

Houses connected to liquor violations

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

Liquor license violations by a Lawrence caterer last month took place at Delta Tau Delta and Sigma Nu fraternity parties in Manhattan, the Kansas Alcoholic Beverage Control said on Monday.

BJ's Catering, Lawrence, received 12 violations from ABC after an Aug. 23 liquor-enforcement effort by the agency. An additional violation is pending.

Ten of BJ's 12 violations were for allowing possession of alcohol by an underage person; eight of those offenses were noted at the Delt party, two at the Sigma Nu event.

The other two violations were for failing to properly notify ABC of a catered event with alcohol, public information officer Sheila Walker said Monday. BJ's told the agency about the parties, she said, but they weren't explicit enough.

"They have to give us a copy of the contract, a clear description of the location, a list of personnel who will be working at the party and the hours of the event. They did not provide complete information about the parties. They notified us, but their information just wasn't complete," she said.

Delt President Aric Harris refused to comment about the violations.

"At this time, we have no comment, but thank you for calling," Harris said before hanging up the phone.

John Pope, Sigma Nu president, and Ryan Kerschen, vice president of internal affairs for Interfraternity Council, could not be reached for comment.

BJ's still might not have received word about the violations, Walker said. They were mailed Monday.

She said other pending violations from the Aug. 23 ABC crackdown have not yet been filed. Lucky BrewGrille, Longhorn's, and Silverado Saloon, all of Manhattan, face possible license violation charges from ABC.

While not criminal offenses, the violations could still result in a $1,000 fine per incident and the revocation or temporary suspension of the businesses' liquor licenses.

THE FINAL DAYS OF FARRELL LIBRARY

FAMILIAR FACES & NEW PLACES

RACHEL MORELAND started working in Farrell Library as a clerk in 1966, while she was a graduate student. This is Moreland's 31st year at Farrell.

Library worker sees 31 years of changes

APRYL MATHES
staff writer

One of the wisest resources at Farrell Library won't be found in periodicals. It can be found in the staff.

Rachel Moreland, Farrell Library employee, has been working at the library since 1966.

"I came to campus to check out graduate school and someone I talked to said I should try getting on at the library," Moreland said. "So that's how I got in the door, just because I needed a job."

Moreland started as a clerk while she attended graduate school, receiving her master's in family economics in 1970. That summer, she was promoted to library assistant in charge of circulation.

"Actually, nothing really changed with my duties, just my name," Moreland said. "I was pretty much doing everything anyway."

The only thing really changing at that point was the library itself. An addition to Farrell was completed in 1970.

However, problems arose with the facilities, Moreland said.

"They plopped this building down and they forgot about water getting in," she said. "When the first big heavy rains came, we got about four inches of water in the basement. Luckily, at that point we didn't have a lot of books down there."

After the flooding incident, Moreland continued to work in circulation until 1986, when the library began a reorganization process.

The reorganization couldn't have come at a better time, she said, because she was getting a little burned out on books.

"It was pretty obvious that everyone was going to be shuffled around," Moreland said. "I was tired of circulation anyway, so it was time for a change."

Change meant the decision for Moreland to take a year sabbatical to study

Library adds new features to meet students' needs

APRYL MATHES
staff writer

Many students might pass the library up as a study area in favor of coffee shops or the K-State Student Union.

However, the new and improved Farrell Library could have more to offer than students might think.

"We definitely want students to come," Brice Hobrock, dean of the library, said. "We feel we have to have good facilities like lights, heat, computers and friendly seating."

There are now 100 new units of soft seating for people to enjoy, Hobrock said, as well as new computers.

The purchase of those new computers, Hobrock said, is regarded as a necessity to serve the needs of the students.

"As recently as 12 years ago, we used to quibble over whether to buy one or two computers and who would get them," Hobrock said. "Today we buy them a hundred at a time."

These factors have definitely led to a steady increase of students using the library, Hobrock said.

Matt Wildman, sophomore in pre-medicine, said he was impressed by the new and improved library.

"It's a vast improvement," Wildman

Union expansion delayed; contractor to be named

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

The K-State Student Union enhancement project is two weeks behind schedule, said Bernard Pitts, director of the Union in the Union Governing Board meeting Monday night.

The project will be presented to the State Architectural Office on Oct. 13. If passed, it will go on to the State Purchasing Office and a contractor will be hired. Pitts said the state hopes to have a contractor as soon as November or December, but it might take longer.

"On worst scenario, we should have a general contractor by the first of the year," Pitts said.

Pitts said the project is ready to start. One of the problems will be how to complete the project and minimally affect the services available at the Union.

Students can see samples of the color schemes chosen for different areas in the display case on the second floor of the Union.

All other 3-D presentation items and a narrative update of the project will be displayed in the case in the future.

LT. KEVIN GILL of the Riley County Fire Department hoses down Daniel Strom's car Monday afternoon on Anderson Avenue.

Birthday present catches fire; owner without transportation

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

Flames danced in the eyes of 15-year-old Daniel Strom, whose birthday was Saturday.

They weren't from candles on his birthday cake.

His present was on fire.

Strom and his mother, Christina, were eastbound in Daniel's gift — a 1986 Ford Escort wagon — on Anderson Avenue at about 4:30 p.m. Monday when the vehicle caught fire.

A Standard Plumbing employee called emergency personnel from his cellular phone. Manhattan and Riley County fire department members arrived a short time later and extinguished the blaze.

Christina Strom said she had purchased the vehicle earlier this month for her son. They were on their way to register him for a driver's license when the fire broke out, she said.

The vehicle had smoked slightly since she bought it, Strom said, but mechanics told her it was because the engine oil had been filled too full and that the smoke would go away. The smoke from the fire, she said, was different.

"This was a different smell, obviously," Christina Strom said.

It was at the intersection of Scenic Drive and Anderson Avenue that the mother and son noticed something was wrong.

"I stopped at the four-way stop and then went on a little way. All of a sudden there was no power with the gas pedal, so I pulled over to the side of the road. Then I noticed the smoke and told him to get out," she said.

The two sat on the side of the road and watched the car burn until help arrived.

"He asked me if he could blow out his candles and make a wish," Christina Strom said.

Christina Strom expressed appreciation to the unidentified Standard Plumbing employee who stopped to summon help.

"Without him I wouldn't have been able to do anything," she said.

Daniel said his driving options now are limited.

"I'll probably have to drive my mom's car for a while," he said.

A damage estimate was not available at the scene.

Noise from football practice disturbs residents

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

The noise of a crowd could be heard for blocks around KSU Stadium on Monday night.

Dana Rohrbaugh, junior in psychology and resident of Jardine Terrace Apartments, reported the noise to K-State Police around 9 p.m. Monday night.

"When I called the police they got it on the recorder, and the noise interfered with the call," Rohrbaugh said. "The dispatcher couldn't even hear me. She asked what all the noise was."

Dave Johnson, campus police lieutenant, said the noise was coming from the public address system on top of KSU Stadium at the north end of the field. Johnson could not say what the noise was, other than it sounded like crowd noise.

Chris Masters, graduate assistant in the Sports Information Office, said the noise was a simulation of a crowd to help the football team adjust to the noise it would face in its upcoming game against Nebraska.

"We apologize for the noise, but it is the best way for the team to adjust to the crowd noise," Masters said.

This is a regular practice with the team, he said, and it normally continues until 10 p.m. Masters said the team has been doing this for the past few years.

Rohrbaugh said she has heard the noise three different times, but this is the first time at night.

"Most people in Jardine have a family, or they are working on their doctorates," she said. "It's 9 o'clock at night, and it sounds like a jet airplane is 5 feet above us."

After calling the campus police, she called the Vanier Football Complex and left a message of the noise on the answering machine.

"To me this is a good indicator of academics vs. athletics," Rohrbaugh said. "This is a good way to show how one relates to the other and which is more important."

A mother of a 1-year-old, she said she was unhappy and when she spoke with neighbors they felt the same way.

"I'm a student, and I might actually want to study," she said. "It's hard when I just got my child to sleep and now this noise starts."

Trailer fire leaves 6 children dead

ARCHER, Idaho — Six children died in an early-morning trailer fire while four others were able to escape after one knocked out a window.

The remains of four children were found Saturday. Investigators searched through Saturday evening until it became too dark to see holes in the floor of the trailer. The remains of the last two children were found the next day.

Craig Peterson, special agent in charge of the state Criminal Investigation Bureau in Idaho Falls, said the ages of the victims are between 5 and 10. The names have not been released.

Kirt Sutton, who lives within 300 yards of the trailer, said he was awakened at about 3:30 a.m. Saturday by four children at his door. They told him their trailer was on fire.

One of the children knocked out one of the trailer's windows, enabling them to escape.

"Basically I called it in and went over, but it was too late," Sutton said. "By the time I got dressed, it was totally engulfed."

Sutton said the children at his door appeared to be between the ages of 7 and 11. The oldest surviving child might have been as old as 14, Peterson said.

Peterson said investigators do not believe any adults were in the trailer at the time of the fire, a cause for which has not yet been determined.

Man convicted for infant's murder 26 years after child found dead

ATLANTA — Twenty-six years after she was blamed for her infant half-brother's death, Tracy Rhame finally got what she wanted Friday — her name cleared and her father convicted of murder.

Jan Barry Sandlin was immediately sentenced to life behind bars for the 1971 beating death of 4-month-old Matthew Golder.

Prosecutors say Sandlin placed his then-2-year-old daughter, Tracy, in the baby's crib and made it look as if she had tossed him out. Ever since, she lived with the blame and guilt, until the burden was lifted by the jury's verdict.

The 46-year-old Sandlin, who is already serving a life sentence in Florida for armed robbery, was indicted last December after a new autopsy on Matthew's exhumed body found his injuries inconsistent with a fall.

Critics say new game promotes violent image of postal workers

TUCSON, Ariz. — The disgruntled, raincoat-clad man takes to the street, shotgun in hand. He shoots down police, pedestrians, a marching band and churchgoers.

As men and women fall bleeding, the shooter mutters, "Going postal."

This is no crime scene. It is a computer game, "Postal," where players can use the main character to shoot, maim, incinerate and otherwise snuff out innocent bystanders and law officers by the busload.

Postal workers and others are furious, though nothing but the title and the muttered phrase links the game to letter carriers.

Chinese company linked to deaths caused by antifreeze in medicine

NEW YORK — Chinese officials have reportedly refused to identify the manufacturer of an antifreeze ingredient that tainted Haitian anti-fever medicine last year, killing at least 80 children.

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention said imported glycerin used to make Haitian brands of the syrup had been tainted with diethylene glycol, a toxic substance used in industrial solvents and antifreeze.

At the time, CDC officials said they did not know where the tainted glycerin came from. But "60 Minutes" reported Sunday that it was traced through European companies to a state-owned company in China, SinoChem International Chemicals Co.

The CBS program said SinoChem got the glycerin from another Chinese manufacturer, then sold it abroad, certifying it as 98-percent pure.

According to the report, SinoChem and Chinese authorities have refused for the past 13 months to tell the U.S. Food and Drug Administration who manufactured the glycerin.

Diethylene glycol can cause kidney failure, hepatitis, pancreatitis and severe neurological problems.

The CDC said the Haiti deaths amounted to the fourth-largest known outbreak of diethylene glycol poisoning. According to "60 Minutes," diethylene glycol in previous poisonings was found to have been substituted for glycerin in medicine because it cost about half as much.

Posters to raise violence awareness

COLE EHMKE
staff reporter

Around 600 K-State fraternity and sorority members put up posters Saturday in nearly every public restroom in Manhattan.

▶ A related story. Curious about what goes on every Saturday leading up to Homecoming? Read the story on the eCollegian at collegian.ksu.edu.

The posters begin a month-long awareness program against domestic violence designed by the Manhattan/Riley County Domestic Violence Task Force.

Jamye Elliott, director of the Regional Prevention Center of Northeast Kansas and a member of the task force, said they wanted to send a strong message that domestic violence would not be tolerated.

The campaign, Resist Violence, officially starts Wednesday with a visit from Kansas Attorney General Carla Stovall. An art poster contest for children and a Hands Against Violence Wall are planned. People can pledge resistance to violence by placing their handprints on a wall.

"Our aim is to reduce and ultimately eliminate domestic violence in Riley County," said Judy Davis, coordinator for the Manhattan/Riley County Domestic Violence Task Force.

The event is part of Homecoming festivities put on by greeks at K-State this year, in which greeks volunteer time to the community. This year, greeks volunteer for one of the six Saturday mornings before Homecoming. The Homecoming competition requires that at least 75 percent of the members of a greek organization participate in Paint It Purple to earn points that are totaled to find a winner.

Unlike other Homecoming events, Paint It Purple has no first or second place — just points for participation.

Chris Hansen, Interfraternity Council member and an organizer of Paint It Purple, said the turnout for the first two Saturdays was about 90 percent.

Jami Nelson, one of the organizers and secretary of Panhellenic Council, said more people showed up than were expected.

She estimated the number of greeks that participated in every Paint It Purple activity Saturday to be about 1,000.

About 600 participants met at the Houston Street Ballroom to distribute posters. They broke into groups of five and picked up posters, tape and maps of Manhattan that indicated the area of the city the group was responsible for.

Those that didn't hang posters cleaned, painted and did yard work.

This was the second year for the community service aspect of the greek Homecoming competition and the first year the United Way was involved in the organization.

Paint It Purple was added to last year's competition so there could be a community service aspect to Homecoming, said Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser.

Last year greeks had to find their own community service project, she said.

Over the summer the United Way went to organizations around town and told them they had access to people willing to work.

"It's a win-win situation," said Aileen Cray, director of the United Way. "We've accomplished a great deal in a very short time for projects

3 road projects finished; KDOT continues to work

The past few years have been busy ones for Sandy Tommer, Wamego area engineer for the Kansas Department of Transportation.

But the end, or at least a slower period, might be in sight.

▶ The editorial The editorial board examines the need for the Kansas Department of Transportation to notify people of construction woes.

See Page 4

Though highway construction in the Manhattan area, which Tommer supervises, isn't stopping anytime soon, the harried construction pace of the past few years might be coming to an end, she said.

"Everyone is ready to take a breath for a change," Tommer said.

Of seven recent road projects in the area, three are complete. Others, such as construction on Manhattan's Seth Childs Road, are almost complete, she said.

The heavy workload stems from eight-year-old Kansas highway legislation.

"These projects are all from the comprehensive highway plan of eight years ago. This is just the tail end of the projects from that plan," she said.

"We don't normally have to move more than a couple of projects a year, if that. This has been a big change for us."

The Seth Childs project, which began in March 1996, has affected traffic flow in west Manhattan for more than a year as KDOT has expanded the road from two lanes to four. Work on the project should be complete by mid-November.

For the most part, access to businesses and side roads should be maintained until construction is complete.

"We're still maintaining access as best we can," Tommer said.

Though some ramps and portions of the road have been closed off and on throughout the project, Tommer said football traffic hasn't caused any problems.

This is a signal to her that the maintenance shouldn't cause a problem for daily traffic either.

"I didn't hear of one complaint and haven't heard from anybody else that did either. I assume all went well," she said. "We weren't disrupting game traffic at all. We told the contractor that the ramps at Kimball must remain open for game weekends."

The Seth Childs project might be nearing completion, but the end of work on Highway 24 between Manhattan and Wamego is still more than a year away.

The Seth Childs project will expand the nine-mile stretch of highway from two lanes to four.

The projected completion date is October 1998, but the two new lanes of road have already been completed.

Now contractors will focus on other aspects of the massive project.

"We're going to be switching traffic over to the two new lanes sometime next month depending on the weather, and then the old lanes will be worked on at that time," she said.

UNION

Construction will begin first in the Stateroom cafeteria and then move on to the Union Bookstore. Students and patrons will not be forced to deviate from their normal pattern of going to the food lines.

However, some of the seating will be moved, Pitts said.

"A lot of things aren't being eaten in the Stateroom anyway," Pitts said. "Most students take the food and go to other areas to eat."

The second stage of the construction will involve the bookstore and will eliminate the use of the Flint Hills and Cottonwood rooms, and K, S and U ballrooms for meetings and other purposes.

The bookstore plans to use these meeting rooms as selling stations when they will no longer be permitted to use the current space.

Pitts said another issue will be the ability to get "the right subcontractors to work in the right way to get the work done" in an order that will best suit the students and patrons.

Board members said they know students are concerned about parking and the availability of Union services, and arrangements have been made to have the contractor's employees park at off-site areas as to not take up parking space. Workers will be bused into the site daily.

"We will keep the campus aware of where we've relocated our services and how to get in and out of this building," Pitts said.

Another area of business included an update on the litigation in which the Union is involved in the selection of Commerce Bank as the official sponsor of the new student ID cards.

"We are within weeks of signing the contract with the bank," Pitts said. "There is a very small chance of appeal since we are past the 30 days."

Other banks that bid for the Total Campus Card were requested to submit bids to the university on April 8. The appeal by First Savings Bank of Manhattan wasn't filed until June 27. Parties had 30 days after the announcement of the chosen bank was made to file an appeal.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

OPINION

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1997

Our View, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. The editorial board consists of Collegian editors and other staff members. Our view is the Collegian's official opinion.

Missing bridge on Highway 18 causes problems for travelers

Chances are, if you've traveled west on Kansas Highway 18 to Interstate 70 or came in from the west on the interstate in hopes of exiting at 303, you've been disappointed.

Disappointed may not be the word. How about surprised? After all, when one approaches what once used to be a bridge and finds only open air, the feeling of surprise shouldn't be uncommon.

It's obvious that from time to time our infrastructure must be renovated. In order to do that a bridge here or there might have to be completely demolished and then replaced. This is not uncommon. What is a bit out of the ordinary is when no one knows how to get around it.

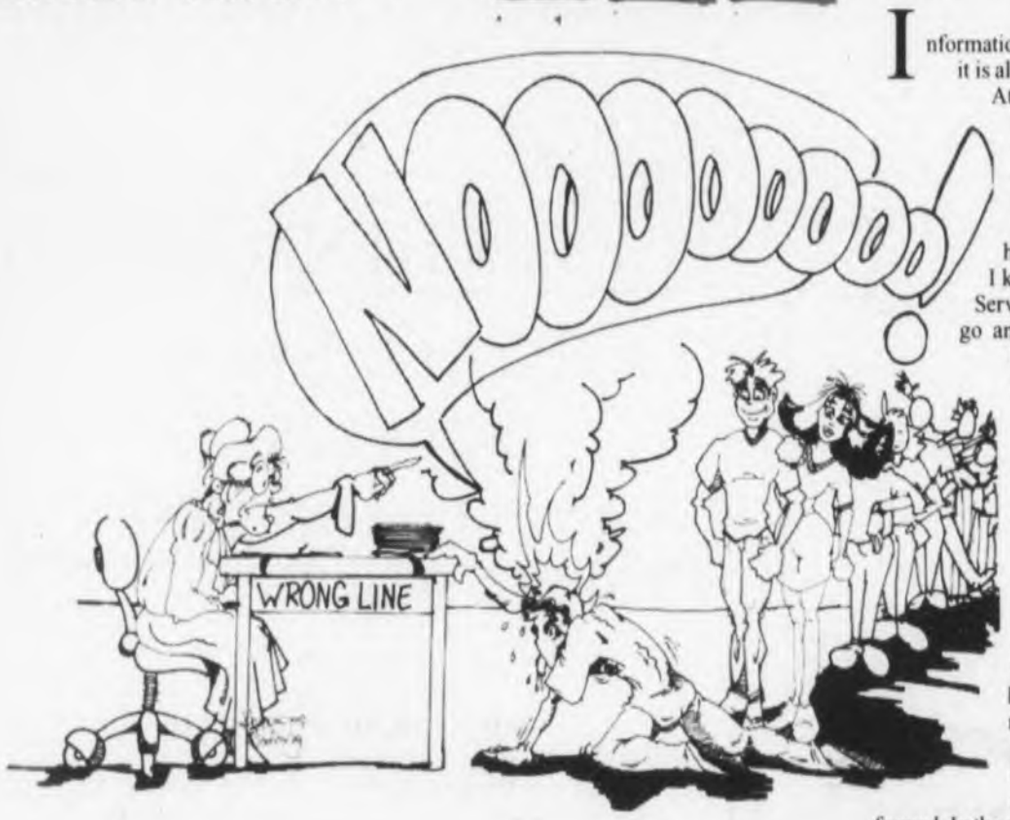
First of all, if you're traveling from the west on I-70, you could be misled by the new Powercat logo on the Fort Riley exit. Is this the detour exit? No.

Maybe this is the reason tons of fans traveling to the game on Saturday were driving all around Fort Riley, trying to get to the stadium.

If you don't exit at Fort Riley, then where do you go? By the time you get close to exit 303, you'll find out that you can't exit there. Do you travel on to exit 313 at the far east end of Manhattan?

Other than wasting time and gas, it could prove to be extremely frustrating if you're trying to get to KSU Stadium in time for the kickoff. No, exit 313 isn't the answer either.

The correct answer is exit 304. Technically, there is a detour sign at the exit but it is extremely small and hard to see. At night it gets even harder to see. Maybe it should be a little bigger or maybe there should be more signs, making it more recognizable to travelers.



In short, all of the previous problems could be solved with a greater effort to inform and instruct the public.

The problem doesn't lie with the project itself. The bridge reconstruction is a must. But instruction and better sign placement should also be a must.

LINES FROM HELL
LONG LINES COULD BE ENDED WITH A LITTLE HELP FROM CYBERSPACE

Information is one of the most valuable commodities I know of, and it is also one that is hard to come by if you are a K-State student.

At the beginning of this semester, fee payment, parking permits, new student IDs and football tickets were one huge question mark starting at the K-State Student Union and ending at Ahearn Field House. The confusion was eminent.

People were just picking lines to stand in, because they had no idea what line they needed to be in.

I know somebody who stood in the Parking Services line at the Union to be told he had to go and stand in another line at the Kramer Dining Center to pick up his parking permit.

Similar things happened when people went to pick up their football tickets. Long, slow-moving lines surrounded Ahearn Field House without a single sign indicating which line a person needed to stand in.

Some people would stand in a line for about an hour before finding out they were standing in the wrong line. After coming to this realization, these unfortunate people were forced to walk all the way around Ahearn Field House to wait in line for two hours to receive football tickets that have been reserved since spring.

Our university needs to find viable methods to get information to students in a timely, efficient manner. We do not need to pay thousands of dollars a year to be uninformed. In the past, information was given to the students during the long lines that persisted at fee payment in Ahearn.

Thankfully, that archaic system has finally gone. However, now we are left with no methods for interacting with the administration, with the exception of showing up at the president's house for tea. Since Jon and I are not on speaking terms anymore, how about coming up with some sort of compromise that is beneficial to all the students?

Why not use the university's Internet resources to their full potential? The university could have all the updates for procedures on enrollment, when to pick up new IDs and even how to obtain football tickets on their home page, which is accessible to every student. Other than having news and events, K-State could also make class schedules and transcripts available to us via the World Wide Web.

Other universities already have Internet systems providing their students with this information. The University of Missouri at Rolla, for instance, has many Internet services.

Natalie Sanders, student in electrical engineering at UMR, students there have access to billing information, addresses, phone numbers, electronic transcripts, share-a-ride information, course catalogs, registration, downloads, everything. Online registration sounds a lot better than standing in line for an hour at Willard Hall.

At Washington University in St. Louis, the students are e-mailed their schedules at the beginning of every semester. Just think, you could never lose your schedule. It would always be saved in your e-mail account, and if you lost your print out you could just print out another one.

Before we all start getting into a hissy fit about privacy and security, let me clear up a few issues. At UMR for instance, all of the information is available only to UMR students. A student must type in a secret PIN before getting access to private information.

Right now on the Web, people are sending credit card numbers and other secret information without fear of being robbed. There are devices in place on the Internet to ensure that your information is kept confidential, and K-State could use these devices to make sure that information about grades or financial aid iskept private.

K-State does not need to sit and wait for this opportunity to pass itby. It is time to invest effort and money into creating a useful home page for its students.

The university's efforts, to date, are admirable but extremely lacking when it comes to useful and timely information the students need and deserve.

Putting transcripts, class schedules and detailed information about K-State events on the Web would make life much simpler, and a lot of headaches would disappear for both the administration and the students.

GETTING ROBBED BY THE TURNPIKE AUTHORITY
Dollars do better deeds at home

Today marks the expiration of the federal Intermodal Surface Transportation Efficiency Act, which in 1991 inaugurated an enormous amount of highway building. Although this law has not funded all the new road construction considered necessary or even come close to clearing maintenance backlogs, Congress has no clear idea how to further fund highways at the federal level.

VIEWPOINT

JONATHAN WINKLER

JONATHAN WINKLER is a senior in physics. You can send e-mail to Jonathan at jnw@ksu.edu.

Instead, it has steadfastly refused to take the federal highway fund off budget, as recommended by the American Automobile Association. Money that could be used to repair roads and improve the prosperity and welfare of this country is being used to reduce the deficit. This leaves state highway departments all over the country begging for money for vital projects.

Kansas itself has urgent needs. The U.S. Highway 54 and Interstate 235 interchange in Wichita has already been identified as a hazard by the Kansas Department of Transportation since westbound U.S. 54 Highway goes from three lanes to two in order to fit under an ancient 1947 bridge, then goes back to three lanes as soon as it crosses the Big Ditch. And, of course, the turnpike just gets more and more congested between Topeka and Kansas City.

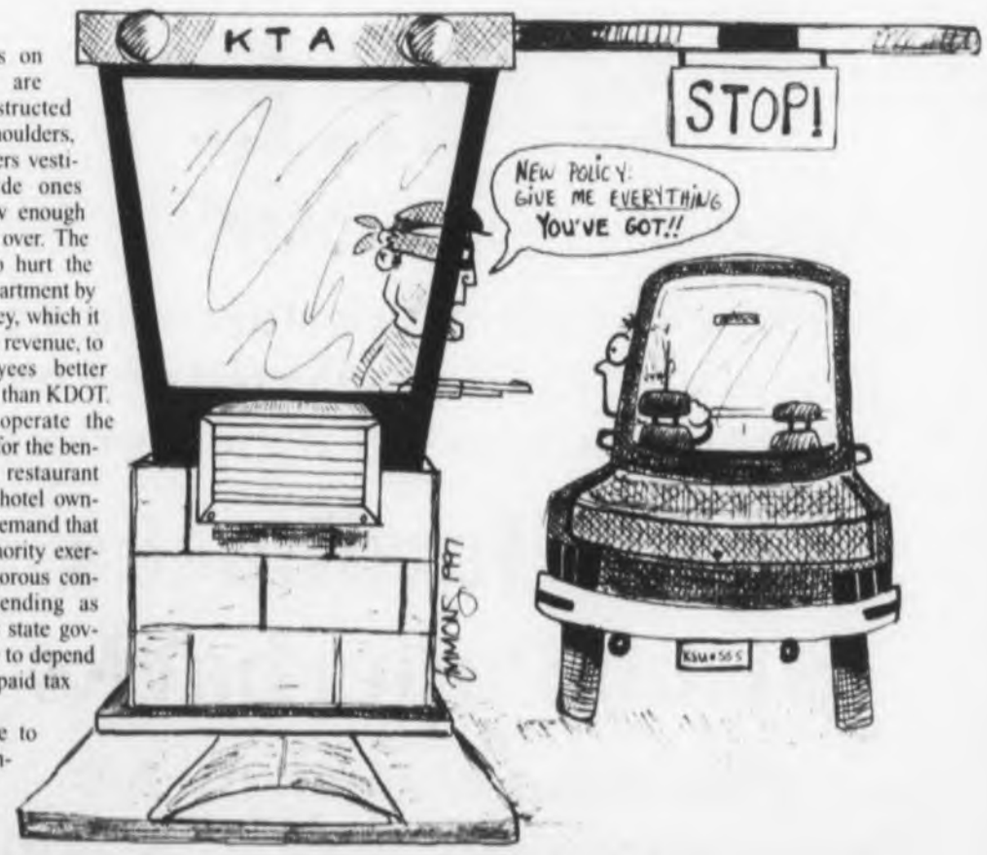
But since I-235 and U.S. Highway 54 are both federal roads, nine-tenths and one-half paid for by the U.S. government respectively, the state has determined to sit meekly and wait for federal largesse before it fixes this problem. It is difficult to blame it because the estimated cost of improving this interchange is nearly $75 million, or about one-third of the annual state highway budget in 1992.

An increase in toll road mileage in Kansas, however, would be very costly to motorists in this state. According to statistics on the Kansas Turnpike Association home page, half of the turnpike's operating revenues come from tolls paid by motorists in Kansas. Thus, Kansans in effect pay 40 percent more to operate the turnpike as a toll road than they would if it were a free interstate.

There are also other costs. The toll paid to drive on the turnpike is really a use tax, but it is not regulated as closely as other taxes because the Turnpike Authority is a semiprivate company supervised by the state but run for the profit of revenue bond holders. Therefore, this tax is magically relabeled as private revenue.

Because the turnpike remits its gas tax money to the state, it has to make up for the lost source of income by charging tolls to pay for road construction. So motorists on the turnpike are double-taxed. They pay tax at service center pumps and pay it again at toll booths.

Although the turnpike uses bidding procedures similar to KDOT's, a higher proportion of its revenues wind up as profit in private hands without resulting in road improvements since the turnpike must pay interest on bonds as well as a profit margin for its contractors.



The turnpike is also more extravagant than the state highway department, although it excuses itself by claiming it's supposed to lead KDOT in engineering technology. It has sent executives to Paris and Switzerland for turnpike conventions without bothering to explain to the public why money paid to maintain a public facility in Kansas has to be spent outside the state and country.

Why do we need to talk to Swiss road engineers? They're skilled, sure, but do we have mountains in Kansas? And can't it be handled by mail anyway?

While bridges on free interstates are routinely constructed with full-width shoulders, the turnpike prefers vestigial one-foot-wide ones that do not allow enough room for pulling over. The turnpike has also hurt the state highway department by using public money, which it relabels as private revenue, to offer its employees better salaries and perks than KDOT.

We do not operate the Kansas Turnpike for the benefit of Parisian restaurant owners or Swiss hotel owners. It is time to demand that the Turnpike Authority exercise the same rigorous control over its spending as other parts of the state government that have to depend upon grudgingly paid tax money.

It is also time to free federal highway money from the clutches of the deficit reducers so that the Kansas Department of Transportation can do its job as well.

Childhood does not excuse hitting

Editor,

Kelly Furnas claims to not be too different from other people in his column on Friday. He enjoys his Lucky Charms and admits it's his intention to "remain childish in spirit."

Regardless of why he's clinging to his childhood, his statement that he "hits girls he likes" sent a chill through me. He claims to be "engrossed in the innocence of youth," which results in behavior that is atypical for the average 20-year-old.

I hope the innocence he strives for doesn't really involve violence toward women. Little boys should learn at a young age that physical aggression aimed toward the opposite sex is not acceptable — I hopethrough their parents' example.

I understand that this column was written just in fun. The first time he mentioned hitting girls, I cringed and read on. However, the last sentence, "I have far too many comic books to read, too many episodes of "Thundercats" to watch and too many girls to hit," represents a true irresponsibility.

Child abuse and domestic violence are prevalent in our society, and jokes about aggression toward women just aren't funny.

My son is 4 years old, and he knows not to hit others, especially girls. Maybe Furnas needs to talk to him. "Stomping in puddles" is one thing — hitting girls is another.

I agree that "a little youthfulness is good for the mind," but I would call his comment pure stupidity.

Kansas, K-State filled with beautiful sights

Editor,

I'm writing in response to Thursday's column "Sight for sore eyes" by Christopher McLemore. There has never been a column that has made me so irate.

First of all, we are living in one of the most beautiful, tranquil areas in Kansas. We have the Konza Prairie, the Flint Hills and both Tuttle Creek and Milford Lake.

Secondly, the artwork on campus is significant. K-State has a rustic, older look. If you add more sculptures, you would take away from that.

K-State should be very proud of Anderson Hall. It marks the beginning of K-State history. We are lucky that it hasn't been torn down to be replaced by a new state-of-the-art building, like many of the historical buildings in our country.

Last of all, I personally don't want to walk around campus looking at a bunch of naked bronze women, even though it is art. I would rather watch the squirrels run across the grass and up the trees. If you want to see that type of art, maybe you should have attended Wichita State University.

Aggieville Octoberfest offers events for all

SARA BURDETTE
staff reporter

The Aggieville Business Association and other members of the Manhattan community have come together to bring the annual Octoberfest to Aggieville. The festival will run from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Saturday.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the association, said the family-focused festival has something to offer for everyone. There will be food, crafts, music, pony rides, face painting and other activities the whole family can enjoy.

"The festival has something for all ages," Sieben said.

The association started forming ideas the day after last year's festival, but they officially began planning this year's festival around eight months ago.

Sieben said one of the most difficult tasks in planning the event was getting realistic ideas. "It is a difficult thing making the ideas reality. Some are good ideas but not realistic," she said.

Merchants from Aggieville and other members of the community worked to bring the attractions to the festival. Although there is no main attraction, there are several new exhibits and booths this year.

Sieben said she encourages the stores in Aggieville to get involved as well. Some of the stores bring out racks of clothes; others have specials offered during the festival.

Some of the new attractions this year include a BMX freestyling show and an antique and new car exhibit.

The Kansas City King BMX and Freestyle team will have three demonstrations of aerial tricks, box jump stunts and flat land tricks, said Waid Davis, owner of Aggie Bike Station. Davis, with help from the store Game Guy, arranged for the team to come to the festival.

The demonstrations will take place at 11 a.m., 1 p.m. and 3 p.m. between Moro Street and the alley of 11th Street. Each demonstration should last 20 to 30 minutes.

In addition to the freestyle show, the American Baking Institute will have a booth set up.

Ron Zelch, director of cake and sweet goods production for AIB, said he intends to have a lot of fresh breads and sweets.

"We try to focus on items that you can't find around town. We try not to compete," Zelch said. The institute, a nonprofit organization, works with students to learn both sales and production.

"The students make everything and many come in with a lot of experience," Zelch said. "Nothing leaves the building unless the students will eat it."

This year they plan to introduce a cherry crumb coffee cake.

In addition, the students are responsible for the advertising, production, marketing and selling of the product they make.

At the end of the festival, they will conduct a summation of sales to see what products the public likes and dislikes.

The festival will also have a raffle to give away a playhouse made of real lumber and flooring. Carl Denning, builder of the playhouse, said they have done the raffle for a number of years and the money raised through the raffle goes toward the Boys and Girls Club, an organization that helps get at-risk children off the streets.

"It's a wonderful organization," Denning said. "We hope to promote a lot more money to the organization."

The houses usually take two weeks to build and are 6 feet by 8 feet. The average cost to build a house is between $1,500 and $2,000, but all materials and supplies are donated.

Griffith Lumber Co. donates around $500 worth of lumber and materials. Irvine's Floor Covering and Steve Lake Lumber and Drywall also help out.

"They donate materials, and I absorb the cost of the house," Denning said.

Denning said he donates so much time to the project for many reasons. "It is neat to see the kids who get the house. This is a neat town, and it is nice to do this for the people," Denning said.

Although the raffle doesn't usually make as much as Denning would like, the past few years it has earned in the low hundreds.

"It would be nice to see it earn in the thousands," Denning said.

With all of the booths and exhibits planned for the festival, Sieben said she hopes for a positive turnout. The festival is planned come rain or shine.

The funding for the festival comes from the booths. Those who want to participate must pay to set up an exhibit or booth. A craft or nonprofit food booth is $30, and food vendors pay $50.

The association uses the money made from the booths to advertise and get sponsors for some of the attractions that are more costly.

Those who run a booth may keep the money they earn.

"The money that they earn goes back to them. They can do what they want with it," Sieben said.

Although there are many exhibits and booths, Sieben said they are still taking ideas and money for booths.

MIT freshman pledge in alcohol-induced coma after drinking at party; fraternity suspended

AT A GLANCE

MIT is the latest school involved in a string of alcohol-related problems plaguing college campuses across the country over the past year.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — The Massachusetts Institute of Technology suspended one of its fraternities after a freshman pledge lapsed into an alcohol-induced coma after a party. Police were also investigating.

Scott Krueger, 18, of Orchard Park, N.Y., was taken from the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity house to a hospital early Saturday. He remained in critical condition Monday.

The student's parents said his blood-alcohol level was .410, well above the legal limit for drivers in Massachusetts. Darlene Krueger said her son attended a fraternity function before losing consciousness.

"They told me it was a party where little (fraternity) brothers were paired off with big brothers," Darlene Krueger said. "The freshmen had to drink a certain amount of alcohol collectively."

Police said vomit and empty liquor bottles were found in Krueger's room at the fraternity house.

The chapter cannot have social events pending the results of the police investigation.

The Interfraternity Council also said the school's 39 undergraduate fraternities, sororities and independent living groups will cancel events at which alcohol is served, pending a review of MIT's alcohol policy.

Fraternity officers reached by telephone Sunday declined to comment.

In August, a student died at a fraternity at Louisiana State University after a night of drinking. It was the latest in several deaths linked to alcohol at fraternities in the past year, including incidents in California, Maryland and New York.

Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat

Public: $26 Seniors: $24 Students: $13
Only Upper Balcony Seating Available

Joseph is the brainchild of teenage composer Andrew Lloyd Webber, and lyricist Tim Rice. Although the 1968 debut as a 15-minute religious cantata for a prep school concert hardly resembles today's Tony-nominated musical, the early conmmission inspired the duo for a megahit.

The plot follows the biblical tale of Joseph and his jealous brothers, who sell him into slavery out of spite for their father's preference of Joseph, his splendid coat, and his predictive dreams.

Experience one of the Bible's greatest tales of upward nobility.

a little fun

STORIES BY SAM FELSENFELD • PHOTOS BY IVAN KOZAR

The K-State volleyball team got a break last night.

Instead of playing a top-ranked Big 12 Conference opponent, as the Wildcats did this weekend when they faced Colorado and Nebraska, they had fun testing things out while playing an exhibition match.

But this was no scrimmage against a traveling squad of high school all-stars.

The Cats lost in three games to the USA National Team, the team that will represent the United States in the 2000 Olympic Games in Sydney, Australia.

However, it wasn't a disappointing setback for K-State's players.

"It was lots of fun," junior middle blocker Val Wieck said. "This is something that some of us have been thinking about since we were 5 years old. This is such an experience. I don't know how to explain it."

> "It was an absolutely wonderful experience. It was awesome."
>
> Devon Ryning
> team captain

The match was the first of a nine-game exhibition tour for the national team. Although the match was played at Ahearn Field House, it was played on the national team's home court.

The team brought in its own floor, covering up the purple court the Cats normally play on. That, combined with the TV cameras and the best competition in the nation, created an atmosphere far more exciting than K-State's early season match against University of Texas-Arlington.

"I thought it was unbelievable. I had the greatest time playing tonight," senior setter Devon Ryning said. "I wish I could do this every night. I have fun all the time, but this was just awesome — the red, white and blue court, the Cats vs. the United States of America. It was just awesome."

But the excitement the Cats felt showed in K-State's play to open to the match. The Cats battled nerves and fell behind 8-0 to start game one. In that game, K-State had nine attack errors and an attack percentage of -.083.

"We were a little nervous because of the unexpected," Wieck said. "We didn't know what to expect. We just came out wanting to have fun. That was our main thing."

K-State lost the game 15-4 but came out more relaxed in game two. The Cats battled the USA National Team, engaging in a sideout war and keeping the game close.

"There was a lot of nerves, but once we got relaxed and realized we had nothing to lose, we had a really good time out there," freshman middle blocker Kelle Branting said. "It was great fun."

During game two, there were six lead changes and four ties. K-State had fewer errors, more kills and a higher attack percentage than the national team.

The Cats never had a game point, but they fought one off while down 14-12. After the sideout, they closed the gap to 14-13 behind junior swing hitter Kim Zschau's service. After a National Team sideout, they fought off another game point and came back to tie the game at 14.

The National Team scored to force another game point, but the Cats survived again.

However, poor service play ended up costing K-State the game. The Cats gave the ball back to the National Team on a service error and lost the game on an ace.

The Cats lost the game 16-14 to fall behind 2-0.

In the third game, Coach Jim McLaughlin took most of the starters out of the game to give everybody a chance to play against the national team. K-State took a 3-1 lead, but the national team went on an 11-1 run to close out the match.

The Cats lost the match 3-0, but they weren't very concerned with the outcome.

"To come out here and be like, 'Do you guys think you played well?' I just don't think that was the whole purpose of this tonight," Ryning, the team captain, said. "I think we did the things we needed to do. It was an absolutely wonderful experience. It was awesome."

The Cats remained competitive on defense, blocking the same amount of shots as the national team. On offense, sophomore outside hitter/middle blocker Dawn Cady and Zschau led the Cats with 12 kills each, more than any member of the national team.

"There's people on this team that can play on the national team right now," Ryning said. "Some girls on our team were pretty awesome tonight."

Newcomers Branting and Shepherd tackling huge assignments in early part of season

Freshman middle blocker Kelle Branting was playing for North Platte (Neb.) High School at this time last year.

Junior hitter Alexis Shepherd played for Barton County Community College last season.

Both players signed to play volleyball at K-State and knew that playing against Nebraska, Texas and Colorado would be a big step up in competition.

But neither expected tackling the assignment they faced Monday night — playing against the USA National Team, the team that will represent the United States in the Olympics in the year 2000.

"When (K-State coach) Jim (McLaughlin) first mentioned the idea of us playing the national team, I was like, 'Oh my God, we're playing the national team.' It really shocked me," Branting said.

Branting said she was nervous for the Wildcats' first matches in Big 12 Conference play against Colorado and Nebraska last weekend, but that didn't compare to the anxiety she felt before the match against the national team.

She knew she was going to play against some of the top teams in the country, but she sure didn't have thoughts of stepping up and starting in a match against the national team when she was sitting in high school classrooms this spring. Branting said she just tried to keep the pressure from getting to her during Monday's match.

"I was trying to clear my head," she said. "I was just thinking, 'Get it between the white lines and make them pass it.'"

Shepherd dealt with the same problems and tried to focus on playing good volleyball.

"I was really nervous, but then again, I was just out there trying to play hard and work on my basics and get better," Shepherd said. "I was a little scared, but as the match went on, I got untensed about it."

Both had three kills and Branting assisted on four of the Cats' six blocks. Also, each had key runs while serving to help keep K-State competitive in game two.

Although the Cats lost in three games, they are happy with the positives the match brought the program.

"It just goes to show how Kansas State is really putting itself on the map right now in volleyball," Branting said. "It's really a great honor to have them want to come here and play us."

Shepherd said the Cats came out trying to win the match, even though most people thought they didn't stand a chance. They tried to ignore the commotion and focus on their side of the net.

"We were out there worrying about our team instead of them, just doing the little things right," Shepherd said.

In losing 3-0, K-State didn't do enough of the little things right. But McLaughlin is pleased with the effect the match had on the team.

"You learn from this stuff. You really do. You benefit from playing people better than you," he said.

Branting hopes to benefit from the match four years down the road.

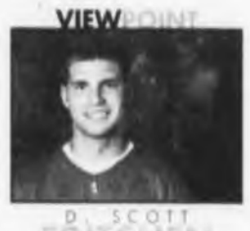
She said it's a dream of hers to play for the national team. She grew up in Nebraska watching Allison Weston, who plays for the national team now, play as a Cornhusker.

She was excited to compete against her, and hopes to wear that same jersey.

But can she do it?

"With a coach like Jim," she said, "I think so."

K-State's most recent drubbing stirs bitterness between opposing head coaches



He looked tired. Oh, he looked like he played every miserable play on Saturday. Truth is, Bowling Green coach Gary Blackney didn't play a single down.

He watched his team take 47 offensive plays and travel 56 yards. He watched K-State's offensive line move his defensive front aside, creating huge gaps for K-State running back Eric Hickson. He watched K-State head coach Bill Snyder send in his second-and third-string players for most of the second half.

And he continued to watch No. 17 K-State score at will.

Oh, the demolition at KSU Stadium brought back memories of the 1995 drubbing against Akron when the Wildcats won 67-0.

VIEWPOINT

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN is a junior in mass communications. You can send your e-mail to Scott at dsf7477@ksu.edu.

The vengeful K-State fans sat licking their chops for more blood on Saturday. After all, this was the Wildcats' turn to shine. They were in Bowling Green's shoes before, when opposing teams scored 45, 56 and 70 points.

The reality is, K-State scored 58 points. Bowling Green didn't score a single point.

And Gary Blackney walked off Wagner Field without shaking Bill Snyder's hand.

Bowling Green is 10 times better than K-State was 10 years ago.

Ten years ago, K-State would have loved to be as good as Bowling Green. Some years, it took K-State five games to accumulate 58 points.

Blackney isn't a bad coach. He won the MAC and American Football Coaches Association Region 3 Coach of the Year in 1991 and 1992. He is 47-23-2 after seven seasons of coaching, and his 21 victories in his first two seasons were more than the program won in the five seasons before his arrival.

But now Snyder is the bad guy. He is cursed with having one of the winningest teams of the '90s. He is cursed with being mentioned with names like Spurrier, Paterno, Bowden and Osborne as being one of the best coaches in the country.

Snyder is the bad guy.

It is times like Saturday when Snyder visits opponents' locker rooms to share his views on defeat and explain how to turn a negative into a positive experience.

Blackney wouldn't talk to him.

Instead, Blackney emerged from his locker room like a victim returning to a crime scene and sat on a chair in the shade of Wagner Field to field reporters' questions.

"They're a good football team," he said. "They'll find out how good they are next week."

Blackney's arms were folded. His words were coarse and choppy and carried through the stiff north wind.

His reddened eyes were distant and cold. The trail of Bowling Green's destruction ended with 58 heartbroken players sitting in the visitors' locker room. He was searching for answers.

The north scoreboard still showed a zero. Blackney would not talk to Snyder, but he would have the final word.

Blackney talked about K-State's quick defense. He praised its massive offensive line.

What were the problems with Bowling Green's offense?

Blackney swallowed his pride.

"Kansas State's defense," he snapped.

He would not comment on the final two touchdowns produced by K-State back-ups who live for games like Saturday when they finally have a chance to play.

For Snyder, it was important for back-up quarterback Jonathan Beasley to showcase his ability. He wanted Beasley to throw the ball. Beasley completed a 43-yard pass to Polica Houston and a 19-yard pass to Shad Meier.

In the beginning of the fourth quarter, Beasley hit Darnell McDonald with a 5-yard touchdown pass.

"I don't want to talk about that," Blackney said. "That's not important. They kicked our butts. They beat us."

For a moment, you wanted to feel sorry for Blackney. The team that hung for a half with No. 7 Ohio State a couple weeks ago never had a chance against K-State.

Never.

Snyder didn't want Saturday to be a dominating performance, but shutouts are important. For him, it's a great tribute to his defensive players and coaches.

Blackney had to retreat back to his locker room in a couple minutes and face 58 heartbroken players and explain to them why they did not score.

Blackney was bitter. He didn't shake Snyder's hand. Snyder said he will call him this week.

Snyder will have the last word.

Rolling Meadows to be site for intramural golf tournament

▶ Tee it up.
Any student who would like to compete in the intramural golf tournament at Rolling Meadows Golf Course on Oct. 12 must sign up between Oct. 6 and 9 at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

MICHAEL RYAN
staff reporter

If the Ryder Cup has you fired up to play competitive golf, you're in luck.

The intramural golf tournament will be at Rolling Meadows Golf Course in Junction City. The fraternity division will play Oct. 12 and the independent, residence hall and women's divisions will play Oct. 19. Golfers will have to pay for their rounds.

Golfers wanting to play in the tournament must sign up Oct. 6-9 at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Steve Martini, associate director of intramurals, said the tournament is both a team and individual competition.

Each team will consist of four people, and each member will play 18 holes. The scores from all the members will be added up for a total team score. The lowest team score will win the competition. Martini said teams will be split up to keep the competition fair.

Individuals who wish to participate without a team are also welcome. Individuals who place will receive extra intramural points for their teams.

Martini said the tournament will use winter rules, meaning the ball can be lifted and replaced with no mulligans.

Last year, 128 men and four women participated in the tournament. There were 23 teams that participated, 17 of which were fraternity teams.

Sigma Chi won the fraternity title last year by shooting 315. The best individual score was put up by Skip Pankewich who shot a 73. Alpha Xi Delta's Marla Sherrill posted a 93 to capture the women's crown.

PLASTIC Seat Sweat

Southern Culture On The Skids new album offers hardhitting southern rock

REVIEW BY KADY GUYTON

Southern Culture On The Skids is back on tour. Although it won't be appearing near here until the end of October, it was kind enough to release an album to those who need a hit of southern rock and banana pudding before then.

You might remember Southern Culture On The Skids from summer 1996 and their catchy little ditty "Camel Walk," a song about passion and Little Debbie Snack Cakes.

If you've never heard of this band, it sounds like what would happen if the Georgia Satellites and the B-52s had a head-on collision with a sitar. A lot of southern rock influences with some musical showing off.

"Plastic Seat Sweat" shows off SCOTS in all its glory. With songs about such institutions as possum eatin' and shotgun weddings gone bad, this recording is a funny and eclectic (to say the least) offering.

This newest compact disc has added a few new instruments and sounds. There's a considerable amount of sitar, but it's played with such an attitude. The sound just lends to the edge-of-town-across-the-tracks feel. There's also a lot more Hammond organ, but again it only adds and doesn't detract from the rockabilly sound.

Review Music

The horns have a nice depth, and the banjo helps with the country aspect.

The gauge shotgun is just there — and you never argue with a 12-gauge shotgun.

SCOTS has kept its sense of humor with this CD. The songs explore topics from getting picked up by a crack-addled truck driver outside Las Vegas to getting a house plowed over to make room for a strip mall. All sung tongue-in-cheek and proud of it.

It's hard to get too worried about this band when it handles all its tough times with tambourine in hand.

The three instrumentals are designed to get you moving no matter what your taste. "Dance for Me" is designed for belly dancing.

"Theme From 'The Cheaters'" is the title track to a movie that has never been made. But in case it is, the title's done. "Cheaters" has a nasty bass beat that make hip-swinging unavoidable. Think of strippers circa 1966.

"Deja Varoom" has an extremely spacey feel. If lounge music is ever played on Mars it will be this song.

The songs with vocals are fun to listen to and Mary Huff's voice is smoky and smooth at the same time. She really shines on "House of Bamboo," an old Earl Gran song with a heavy espresso theme. Too bad she only solos on a couple of tracks.

"Plastic Seat Sweat" is meant to be played loud, preferably while driving on dirt roads in a really big car with viny upholstery. Or save it for the next time you serve possum.

Arts center social focuses on increasing membership

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Membership is the key.

That was the consensus at the Manhattan Center for the Arts art social Monday night in the center's theater. The social was interim Executive Director Chris Heavey's way of inviting the community and arts center patrons to hear about the arts center's plans.

Heavey, who was appointed by the board only weeks ago when Terrie McCants resigned, said the arts center remains $40,000 short of full funding.

He concluded the social with an impassioned plea for increased membership.

"That is the bottom line," Heavey said. "This organization has to grow by $40,000. I have 500 members. We need members. We need your help."

Heavey said adding more dollars to membership is not the answer. He said he wants to increase membership to 3 to 5 percent of the community population.

"I'm a business guy, not an art guy," Heavey said. "I need your help. This doesn't run by itself."

He said the arts center struggled its first year after the merger of the Manhattan Arts Council and Manhattan Civic Theatre. He said the staff talked with the staff of the Columbian Theatre in Wamego and the staff has found ways to improve member communication using a new computer program.

"It's got to stay together to grow. It's been a difficult year," Heavey said. "We want to figure out how to fix the problems and move on."

Heavey began the meeting by telling the audience of nearly 75 that the social's purpose was communication — to inform all the arts center's committee members, at the University of Missouri at Columbia for her master's of library science.

First, however, she had to get the idea past Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

Hobrock was all for it, she said.

"He thought it was a grand idea," Moreland said.

Upon her return to Farrell, the computer skills she had learned while at school made her a resource for staff and students.

"I found myself teaching an awful lot of people about computers," Moreland said. "That was the beginning of online everything."

Indeed it was.

The advent of computers meant the library staff had to learn how to use Farrell's system as it became increasingly automated.

Not everyone was as thrilled with the new system as Moreland was.

"What I've discovered is that people who were further along in their careers thought, 'Hey, I'm not going to put up with this stuff,'" Moreland said. "The whole thing with computers is definitely love 'em or hate 'em."

Moreland definitely loved them.

"Now, I've always loved typing and speed and computers," Moreland said. "I got my very first one at work in 1986."

However, her time with her computer was short-lived.

"One time I came to work and someone had stolen my computer," she said. "One day, about nine months later, it showed back up at the back door. We checked some of the files and things and apparently someone had used it for class."

Moreland said the computer was still in excellent shape.

"We were just glad to get it back," she said. "It was just borrowed for a little while."

When Moreland wasn't tracking down computer fiends, she found time to raise her six children.

"They're all very astute information gatherers," she said. "I might have had something to do with that."

It's a distinct possibility.

said. "It was much needed."

However, all that added space can lead to confusion, Wildman said.

"I got lost four times last time I was there," Wildman said. "It's huge."

With all the changes, Hobrock said, there's bound to be some perplexed students.

"I had to ask four different desks where I could find a dictionary," Jody DuBois, sophomore in social work, said.

While things were hard to find, Wildman said, the staff was very patient with his questions.

"They were cordial and eager to help," he said.

DuBois said she preferred Manhattan Public Library for doing research, but she likes the study atmosphere at Farrell.

"It's always quiet," she said. "There's a lot of space to spread out."

One of the goals of the new library is to create a pleasant atmosphere for studying. One of those changes is to buy tables that seat smaller groups.

"In 1927, the student body was right at 2,000 students, and everyone knew each other," Hobrock said.

"No one had a problem sitting with 10 other people," he said.

But times and people have changed, he said.

"Today, we're 10 times bigger, and the trend has been to smaller tables," Hobrock said.

One of the largest changes, he said, is the creation of a 24-hour study area complete with a microwave and vending machines.

The input of students prompted the concept.

"Students made it very clear that they like to lie down when they study and have something to eat and drink," Hobrock said.

The study area can accommodate up to 200 students and is on the first floor.

Wildman said he'll be checking the place out when he hits the books.

"It sounds very appealing," he said. "I look forward to taking advantage of that."

Hobrock said he hopes the concept of studying at the library will catch on.

"We're doing about everything we can to be more student-friendly," he said.

volunteers and supporters of current and future programming.

After briefly discussing the meeting's goal, Heavey introduced the arts center's committee members, who all gave brief overviews of their committees' missions and programming slates.

Don Wissman, chair of the board, said the board is forming a committee to take nominations and interview for a long-term executive director.

Heavey is serving as director until Dec. 30.

"The thing we haven't done very well at the arts center is tell our story," Wissman said.

Wissman said he would like those present to consider improving their membership level in the arts center.

Following Wissman's comments, committee chairs for the theater, the Clay Coalition, BirdHouse Productions, the CityArts magazine, and the art gallery presented summaries of their programming.

Janice Lee, chair of the membership committee, again brought up the subject of increasing membership.

"All of these wonderful things you're hearing about, we couldn't have if we didn't have membership," she said. "When someone joins an organization like this wonderful arts center, they take ownership. We need this community to take ownership of this arts center."

that nonprofits have to put on the back burner."

She added that they've had nice compliments on the work done and the attitudes of the volunteers for the first two Saturdays of Paint It Purple.

"The agencies have been really, really pleased," Cray said.

The United Way let organizations know how many volunteers were available and when. Then the groups let the United Way know what they had in mind for the volunteers to do.

The Domestic Violence Task Force requested 500 people. The task force wanted to blanket the community as part of its awareness program and thought placing posters in every public restroom would be the most effective way of spreading awareness.

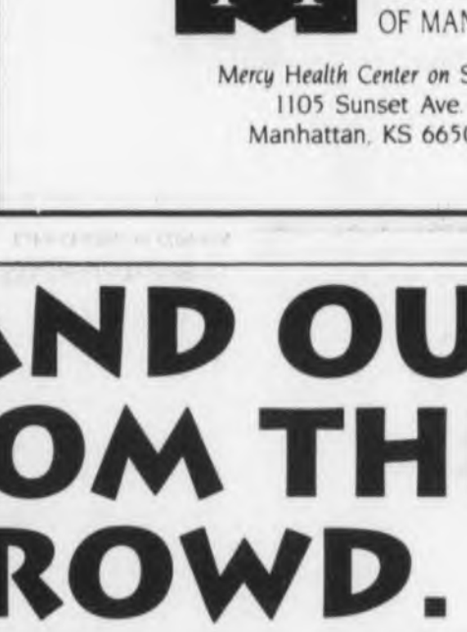
The task force is made of 30 volunteer professionals from the Manhattan community. Included among the members are the Riley County attorney, a municipal judge, the director of the Riley County Police Department and a city commissioner.

It is trying to emphasize prevention and intervention.

Nelson thought the day was a success.

"It was overall a very good day for Manhattan — the blowout game, K-State Band Day and the community service," she said.

Nelson didn't have much time to savor the success. After all 2,000 posters were handed out, there were still volunteers available. She found a group of 30 to help with another Paint It Purple project at Tuttle Creek.



"A lot of college students don't know what's out there to volunteer for," she said. "When they think of community service they say, 'I can only do highway cleanup.' This makes them more aware of how to help."

Deceased student honored at ceremony

In a dedication ceremony at the Military Science Hall on Tuesday, the shooting range in the basement was named the Tyler Houdek Memorial Range in memory of 2nd Lt. Tyler Houdek, who died last spring.

Houdek, who was a senior in history and an active member of the Army ROTC, was also an integral part of the range's renovation process. During the ceremony, a trophy case containing Houdek's boots, which had been bronzed, an American flag, his dog tags and his uniform were dedicated to the range. A plaque that lists his accomplishments now also hangs in the entrance to the range.

Houdek

Lt. Col. Robert Kennedy, who led the ceremony, said the dedication was fitting for Houdek.

"This is a humble, important ceremony for us," he said.

Kennedy said the range had needed a significant face-lift because of dangerous levels of lead in the shooting lanes from years of use. Houdek, who was Operations manager for the Army ROTC, decided something had to be done. The only problem was money.

Houdek's first priority when he and others would ask for money from other departments and colleges for the renovations was to make sure the donators knew the Army ROTC was going to do its fair share of the work, Kennedy said.

Houdek also donated money out of his own pocket to get things rolling.

"College kids don't have much money anyway, but he turned over his own money," Kennedy said.

Others followed and soon the Army ROTC was on its way to the first $1,500 needed to get the renovations started. Houdek organized a work detail during winter break to get the cleanup on its way.

The total cost of the renovation was $11,500, Kennedy said. He estimated that the total probably would have been around $16,000 if the cadets wouldn't have done so much of the work themselves.

After the dedication ceremony ended, five of the lanes were open for any of the approximately 40 people in attendance to practice their shooting.

The targets at the end of the lanes had been replaced by pictures of Jayhawks. Yells of "kill that Jayhawk" could be heard for 15 to 20 minutes while people took turns shooting.

The range is 71 feet by 119 feet and has 15 lanes.

Basic riflery classes and a 4-H shooting club use the lanes. The range is also used for many shooting contests.

Analogies show immensity of library addition

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

The numbers speak for themselves.

Farrell Library had 197,333 square feet. Hale Library has 350,333.

Farrell had 850 seats. Hale has 2,000.

The $30 million addition to Farrell — soon to become Hale — Library nearly doubles the building's size. But Jerry Carter, director of Facilities Planning and university architect, said putting the size of the huge new structure into real-world statistics makes the gravity of the addition easier to understand.

Hale Library

UPCOMING

- TODAY. Read about the history of the library on Page 7, and learn more about the new space available in the library on Page 10.
- THURSDAY. Read about the future of Denison Hall, examine the contents of the library, take a gander at the gallery space available, and learn about the funding task force.
- FRIDAY. In a special pull-out section, learn more about the periodical situation, meet Brent Bowman and the Hale family, take a closer look at building costs and the fund-raising efforts, participate in a walking tour of the new library, and prepare yourself for the dedication ceremony.

The amount of construction materials used in the library was large, Carter said. Very large.

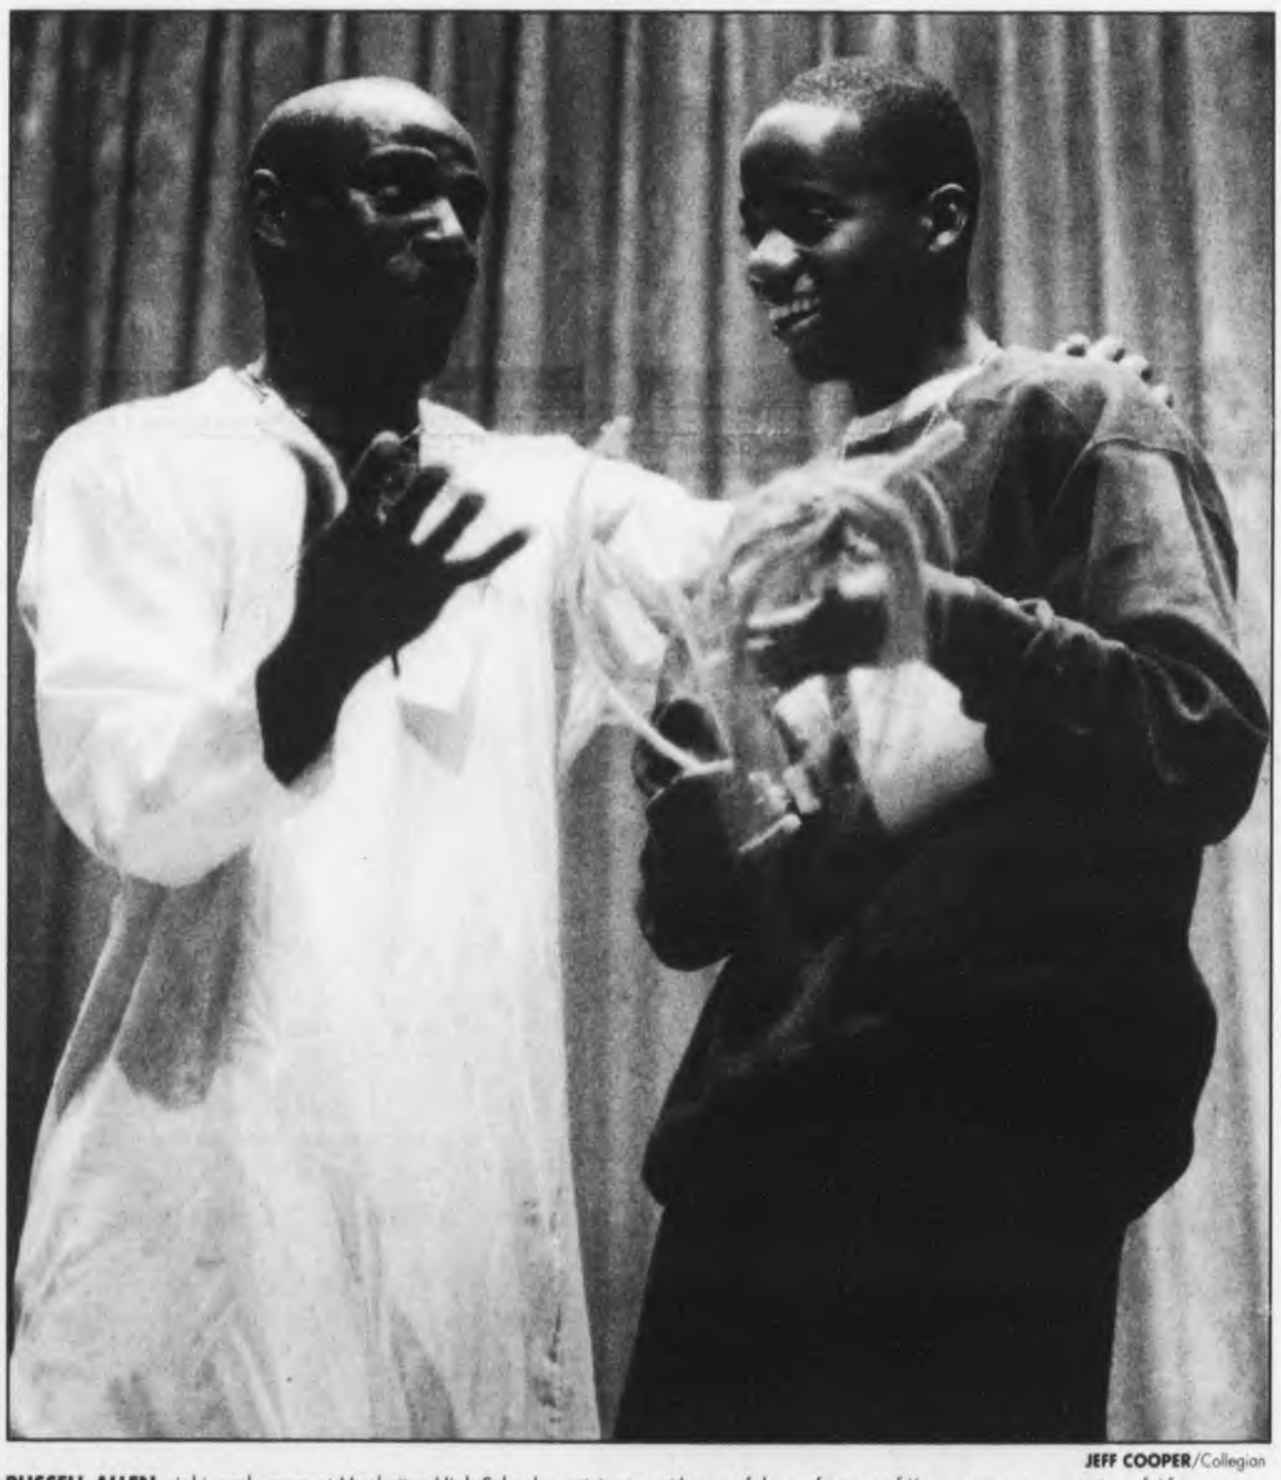
"There's enough concrete in the building to send another four-lane highway out to the interstate from here. We could do another Highway 177 out to I-70 and we would still have concrete left over," he said.

Carter said other, smaller materials were also used extensively to make Hale a reality.

"If we melted down three Union Pacific locomotives and converted all that metal to screws, nuts and bolts, we'd still probably need at least another boxcar's worth of screws, nuts and bolts to build this building," he said.

The reason for the high amount of materials, Carter said, is the amount of square feet in the addition. But high ceilings also play a factor, he said.

"There's a huge volume of space. When you talk about square feet, that doesn't take into account how tall the building is and how much volume it has," Carter said.



Aluminum was another material used extensively in the Hale addition. Carter said it was used for window molding, and heating, ventilation and air conditioning ducts. That translates into quite a few aluminum cans, he said.

"It would probably take years of steady drinking

Alcohol takes life of MIT student

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Three days after falling into an alcohol-induced coma, a Massachusetts Institute of Technology freshman died, and the investigation was turned over to homicide detectives.

Maura McLaughlin, spokeswoman for Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center, said today that Scott Krueger, an 18-year-old fraternity pledge, died Monday night.

McLaughlin said she could give no details at the family's request.

Krueger

The death is being investigated as a homicide, said Officer Kevin Jones, a Boston Police Department spokesperson.

Krueger, of Orchard Park, N.Y., had been in a coma since Friday, when he was found at the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity house in Boston with his heart stopped. Police said vomit and empty liquor bottles were found in Krueger's room.

▶ The editorial. Binge-drinking is a growing problem on college campuses. At K-State, groups exist to provide alcohol awareness, but students should use some common sense if they drink.

Krueger's parents said their son's blood alcohol level had reached .410 percent — five times the legal limit for drivers in Massachusetts — and that he had attended a fraternity function before losing consciousness. They said hospital physicians had to pump charcoal into their son's stomach to soak up the alcohol in his system.

Fraternity officers have declined to comment.

Equipment fee to be re-reviewed by committee

BENJAMIN YODER
campus government editor

Confusion about the length of a loan between the Kansas Development Finance Authority, a state financing plan, and the Student Governing Association on behalf of Student Publications Inc. caused the Student Publications Equipment Fee budget to be pulled out of its regular fee cycle Sept. 14.

The equipment fee was scheduled for review before the 1999-2000 academic year, but Student Senate Chair Jeff Dougan requested in a letter to the Privilege Fee Committee that the fee be reviewed this year.

Bret Glendening, Privilege Fee Committee member and agriculture senator, said he understood why the fee was being reviewed.

"It was viewed as the right thing to do," he said. "Student Publications had their hearts set on the money that we allowed them to get from students."

Last spring, Senate passed the equipment fee budget for nearly $120,000 over two years. The budget was to purchase an insert machine, computers and upgrades for the computer system for the Collegian, Royal Purple and Campus Directory.

However, Student Publications Inc. believed the budget was approved for nearly $240,000 over four years, said Patrick Carney, last year's Board of Student Publications chairman.

When the contract was drawn up this summer, Dougan noticed a discrepancy between the contract and the legislation approved by Senate. The contract was for four years, but the legislation had no mention of a four-year plan.

Glendening, who was also a senator last year, said last year's Senate should have realized that it was voting on a four-year proposal.

"Based on what was said during the meeting, in debate, the way the committee promoted the bill, I believe everyone should have felt they were voting on a four-year deal," Glendening said. "But as we all know, it's not the intention of the bill but what is actually written in black and white.

"Unfortunately that one paragraph that actually said that it would be a four-year deal was omitted from the actual legislation that passed."

Between the time the legislation was introduced to Senate and the time it was approved a week later, a section of the bill stating that the loan was to be for four years had been left out of the legislation.

According to a June 19 article in the Collegian, Jake Breeding, last year's Privilege Fee chair, said a clerical error caused the section to be omitted from the legislation approved by Senate. He said it was the intention of the Privilege Fee Committee to fund Student Publications Inc. for four years, not two.

Aaron Otto, current Privilege Fee chair, said Student Publications Inc. was notified that because the legislation passed by Senate specifically stated a two-year loan, only a two-year contract could be signed.

"I don't think signing a four-year contract, from our standpoint, was ever a possibility because we weren't authorized to," Otto said.

Because Student Publications Inc. received only half the amount it believed it was going to get, only half of the equipment it had intended to

Co-defendants flee country, leave doctor to stand fraud trial alone

SANTA ANA, Calif. — Dr. Sergio Stone, one of three doctors who ran a fertility clinic shut down because of an embryo-swapping scandal, faces trial alone because both his co-defendants fled the country.

Stone and his two former partners at the University of California-Irvine Center for Reproductive Health, which was closed in 1995, are charged with mail fraud, filing false tax returns and conspiracy.

Prosecutors say the doctors cheated insurance companies by billing for services that were never performed and failed to report about $300,000 in cash receipts to the Internal Revenue Service.

The charges make no mention of the egg- and embryo-swapping that led to more than 100 lawsuits and cost $18.4 million so far.

"He wasn't the one who was the big player in the most horrific acts — stealing someone's identity," said Melanie Blum, the leading plaintiff attorney in settlement talks. At least 85 former patients have settled.

Dr. Ricardo Asch, former director of the center, and Dr. Jose Balmaceda are accused of taking patients' eggs and embryos from storage and giving them to other patients without their consent or knowledge. At least 15 babies were born of questionable parentage.

Asch, who blamed lab workers for mix-ups, now practices in Mexico City and Balmaceda in Chile.

Attorneys for the former partners said Asch may return from Mexico to face charges if Stone is treated fairly but Balmaceda has no interest in returning.

Judge dismisses defamation case brought by Secret Service agent

BALTIMORE — A judge dismissed a defamation lawsuit filed by a retired Secret Service agent against the publishers of a book accusing him of accidentally shooting and killing President Kennedy.

U.S. District Judge Alexander Harvey II dismissed the case Monday filed by George Hickey Jr. of Abingdon against St. Martin's Press, Simon & Shuster and author Bonar Menninger.

The judge ruled that under Maryland's statute of limitations, Hickey waited too long to sue — more than three years after the book was published in February 1992.

Hickey was a 40-year-old Secret Service agent when he was assigned to Kennedy's Dallas motorcade in 1963. The book, "Mortal Error," claimed Hickey grabbed an AR-15 assault rifle, and it accidentally discharged when the car he was riding in abruptly changed speed.

Menninger agrees with the Warren Commission's finding that Oswald's shots struck the president but claims Hickey fired the fatal shot from the car behind Kennedy's.

Body of lost boy found in woods

JACKSON TOWNSHIP, N.J. — An 11-year-old boy who vanished while selling merchandise door to door to raise funds for his school was found dead in the woods near his home, authorities confirmed Tuesday.

They said the body found late Monday had been identified as that of Edward Werner, who was believed to be carrying $200 cash from his sales of holiday merchandise when he was last seen Saturday.

Ocean County Prosecutor E. David Millard and township police did not immediately release any information about a cause of death.

One of his school's top sellers, Edward was flashing the money to friends as he made his way around the neighborhood, police said. He had his heart set on winning a pair of walkie-talkies for sales of candy, nuts and wrapping paper as part of the Parent Teacher Association's two-week fall fund raiser.

AIDS treatment not miracle cure

TORONTO — While new treatments have revolutionized the treatment of AIDS, doctors are finding their seemingly miraculous benefits have eluded many infected people.

Just more than a year ago, it became clear that a new class of medicines called protease inhibitors could rescue gravely ill AIDS patients from the brink of death. And it appeared possible to turn this relentlessly fatal disease into a chronic but treatable one.

At the time, though, many worried that the sometimes giddy news reports of this breakthrough glossed over the real possibility that the drugs' benefits would be only temporary for many.

Experiences reported Monday at an infectious disease conference confirm that while the treatments have given hope where there was none, they are hardly the final answer.

Admissions director, alumnus retires after 31 years of service to K-State

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

The bare walls and half-empty bookshelves say it all.

After 31 years in K-State's Department of Admissions, it's time for Richard Elkins to say goodbye.

Elkins will say goodbye to people he loves to work with, students he loves to talk to and a school he simply loves.

K-State has been in his blood all his life, Elkins said, because his parents met here on a blind date in the late 1920s.

In 1956, Elkins graduated from K-State with a degree in agriculture education. He spent a few years teaching and some time in the military before returning to K-State to earn his master's degree in guidance counseling in 1963.

In June 1966, Elkins was appointed assistant director of admissions, and he was named director of admissions in 1974.

"Dick Elkins has a nurturing philosophy that has made an enormous impact on our ability to attract K-State students," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

More than 200,000 students have been admitted to K-State while Elkins has been in the admissions office. Elkins credits that not only to the admissions staff, but also the students.

"The best recruiter is a satisfied student," Elkins said. "A satisfied student will help you. An unhappy student will destroy you."

To keep students satisfied, Elkins relies on his ability to be honest with them.

His honesty was exemplified during a recruitment visit to Colby Community College. Elkins said a woman approached him and wanted to know what K-State had to offer her in music therapy.

"I had to tell her that, 'We'd love to have you as a student at K-State, but you'd be better off at KU for what you want to study,'" Elkins said.

She soon returned with two friends in tow, he added. Both of them ended up coming to K-State as a result of his honesty.

Elkins said he figures he might lose a student once in a while, but for every loss, he gains two others.

It's seeing those students he has reached go places and do well that make all the years of hard work worthwhile, Elkins said. While his years of hard work at K-State have come to an end, Elkins has no intention to stop supporting K-State.

Bosco said Elkins will continue to have a strong presence at K-State. "We'll miss his work, but his vision will be with us long after his retirement."

The vision Elkins is working on now is traveling with his wife, Arlene, and spending time with their grandchildren.

However, there is one thing Elkins won't be retiring — his purple pride.

"I'm a K-Stater, tried and true," he said.

"I'M A K-STATER, TRIED AND TRUE."

Bombing victim to avoid trial

ASSOCIATED PRESS

OKLAHOMA CITY — Nancy Ingram won't be among those attending the closed-circuit broadcast of bombing defendant Terry Nichols' trial in its opening week.

The retired Internal Revenue Service secretary spent a quiet day at her home Monday and looked forward to opening arguments in the trial of the man accused of helping build the bomb that changed her world.

"I was so happy before that bombing," she said.

Four vertebrae in Ingram's back were displaced in the bombing, her hand was shattered beyond repair and she has a gash in her lower right leg when a steel bar and tons of concrete fell on her.

Ingram was trapped for 1 1/2 hours before being rescued. The injuries left her unable to stand for long periods of time, she said.

Ingram said Nichols will be convicted for his part in the April 19, 1995, blast that killed 168 and injured at least 500 others.

While Nichols was not in Oklahoma City that day, many believe he helped plan the bombing and aided in the bomb's construction.

"He certainly was a more than willing chauffeur for the process," said Paul Heath, who survived the blast in the federal building's Veterans Affairs Office.

Heath was the only survivor or victim's relative who chose to speak to reporters outside the closed-circuit television auditorium at the Federal Aviation Administration on Monday morning.

He showed reporters photographs of Nichols' house in Herington, Kan., where federal agents found much of the evidence against Nichols and Timothy McVeigh.

Heath also brought up Nichols' nine-hour statement to federal authorities two days after the bombing, pointing out that Nichols admitted driving to Oklahoma City to pick up McVeigh the Sunday before the bombing.

Others attending the broadcast climbed into blue vans that were waiting to take them from a parking lot to the auditorium.

Turnout was sparse. Only about 20 were in attendance.

Bud Welch was not among them.

He headed as far away as possible from the legal reminder of his daughter Julie's death

"I don't receive much peace out of attending the trial," he said. "I wish that all the legal aspects were over with."

Judge in Nichols' trial angered as potential jurors interviewed

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — The judge in the Oklahoma City bombing trial of Terry Nichols took a break to control his anger Tuesday after getting into a verbal sparring match with a potential juror who suggested computers could do a better job of deciding trials.

Nichols' lead attorney, Michael Tigar, later took issue with the "tone and content" of U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch's questioning and the judge called the attorneys into his chambers.

The squabble began when a computer programmer, a tall, blond man with wire-rimmed glasses, said he had formed an opinion that Nichols was guilty.

The judge noted that making a decision on a man's guilt wasn't like putting information into a computer.

"That's why we don't have computers in trials", Matsch said.

"Maybe we should look at the computer," the potential juror shot back.

"I'm a pretty opinionated person," the man added. "I'm not a computer. I can't just turn that off."

Matsch then called a break, saying he was getting angry with the K-State Cares program focuses on freshman

JULIE LINDAMOOD
staff reporter

Every year, K-State freshmen get phone calls from people who care, said Bill Feyerharm, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

More than five years ago, Pat Bosco, dean of student life, created K-State Cares to extend K-State's concern with students beyond the recruitment process.

K-State Cares is a program in which ambassadors from all colleges on campus call new freshmen in their colleges to see if they have any questions or problems, said Susan Hansen, assistant director of new student services.

The first six weeks on campus are the most important for freshmen because that's when they make the transition both in and out of the classroom, Hansen said. That is something ambassadors watch for when they call freshmen.

"We want to make sure that there's not a student out there that's floundering and doesn't know where to turn," Hansen said.

The ambassadors will finish K-State Cares on Thursday night. The concerns that emerge from the program will be compiled. Feyerharm said New Student Services will take these concerns and approach the office where there is a problem.

In an effort to extend K-State Cares throughout the semester, a series of orientation programs focusing on freshmen in residence halls has been launched. Feyerharm said the programs will help assemble study teams and review sessions and will provide resident assistants the ability to work with students whose grades have begun to falter.

"The goal is to continue what students see when they go through the college search process, and that is, 'Yes, people at K-State care about you, and they are going to make sure you're having a good experience and be there if you need help,'" Hansen said.

College students need to exhibit better judgment when drinking

College students don't have to drink until they fall down. They don't have to drink until they die, either.

But students at five universities have done just that after drinking binges in the past year. The most recent death involved an 18-year-old MIT student.

This behavior makes it seem as if college students think they're invincible. They're not. And binge drinking certainly doesn't help. Ninety-five percent of violent crimes and 53 percent of all injuries on U.S. college campuses are alcohol-related, according to a study done by the Commission on Substance Abuse at Colleges and Universities of the Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University.

The commission, which included former Sen. Nancy Kassebaum Baker, also reported that alcohol is implicated in 41 percent of all academic problems and 28 percent of all dropouts.

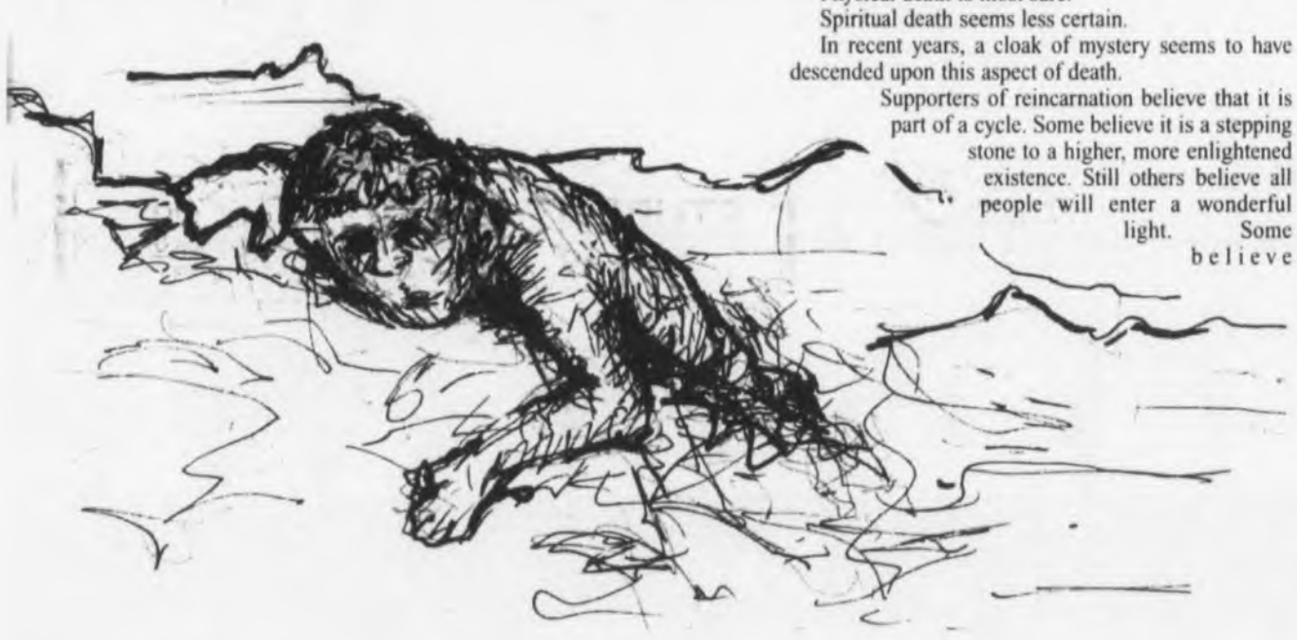
College students need to exhibit some self-control and maturity. If they're going to drink, they should do it responsibly.

The substance-abuse commission suggested continuing education of freshmen throughout the school year.

Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol puts together that kind of education for K-State's greek community. It has the right idea.

But greeks are not the only people who binge drink. All students should drink responsibly and make sure their friends do, too.

A study done by the Harvard School of Public Health found that 44 percent of U.S. college students binge drank in the two weeks before the survey.



If that doesn't include you, it's someone you know. Everyone needs to take personal responsibility. If you know you've had too much to drink, stop. If you know your friends have had too much to drink, watch out for them.

Just one more of those dollar pitchers might not sound like much, but they add up. The substance-abuse commission said students spend more than $5.5 billion on alcohol each year — more than they spend on all other beverages and books combined.

Sooner or later, DEATH calls us all, but we can still live forever

VIEWPOINT

KEVIN BAILEY

KEVIN BAILEY is a senior in elementary education. You can send your e-mail comments to Kevin at (kevinsb@ksu.edu).

The vulture circled ominously in the quickly darkening sky. Its wings beat an eerie cadence in the dusk of the fast-approaching night. The man looked frightened at the sight of his evil nemesis.

He had come — as had been promised.

He had been warned that the vulture would return for him, but he had ignored the threat. In the light of day, it had all seemed like such a fairy tale. But now, as the light faded and the man grew weak, he began to grasp what was happening.

He was dying.

The vulture had returned after all.

What happens when the fluidity of this present life meets the absolute truth of death?

We are all drawn to death as if by an eternal magnet. And, we are not simply drawn by the physical deterioration of our bodies. Rather, the allure of death is found most in some ethereal sense of wondering about the spirit of man.

Physical death is most sure.

Spiritual death seems less certain.

In recent years, a cloak of mystery seems to have descended upon this aspect of death.

Supporters of reincarnation believe that it is part of a cycle. Some believe it is a stepping stone to a higher, more enlightened existence. Still others believe all people will enter a wonderful light. Some believe there are separate destinations for the evil and the dead.

Whatever.

While some might argue to the contrary, I believe not one single person truly believes death is the end. Some claim that when you are dead, you simply cease to be. However, as death draws near, they find their philosophies severely challenged.

Death does that. As the equalizer of all humankind, death has no favorites.

You may be rich and powerful. Death will find you.

You may be a princess; you may be a saint. Death will find you.

You may be homeless, with only a duffel bag of clothes and an umbrella to your name. Death will find you.

You may have a house on 15th Street with a dog and a fence.

Death still finds you.

Death draws near, like a vulture in the darkening skies of life. Swooping and circling, until with a final vicious strike the victim is claimed.

Some say there is no fear in death.

They are wrong.

Even those who would claim to have a solution for the problem of death do not have a complete answer for death. Though some claim to have seen beyond, none might ever be sure exactly what lies in store for those who die.

And therein lies the fear of death. We do not know what comes next.

In life, we know that one day follows another. Whatever terrible and tragic events might occur, we know that time continues on.

Through the conditions, day-to-day lives may deteriorate, time keeps moving, giving us a cadence by which to march. Until one fine day, in the middle of a perfectly good minute, time suddenly ...

Stops.

We die.

Life ends.

The mystery is solved. Finally, the answer is known. It is only in crossing over the boundary between life and death — between time and eternity — that we end our search for truth. After that threshold is crossed, there is no more mystery. All is finally known.

As a person who believes in Jesus Christ as the savior from death, I should not fear death. However, I do not know if I am afraid of death.

I have never had to die.

However, I do know that whatever lies in store for me on the other side of death, it is not death who is the victor. Only one man has ever come back from beyond the grave, never to die again. He is Jesus, and he insured for all who believed in him that death would not be victorious over them.

The late Keith Green said it this way, in his song "Soften Your Heart": "Like everyone else, you're scared of dying. But, the power of death has been blown apart. And, you'll live forever — if you soften your heart."

I do not know what will happen when the vulture of death comes for me. I may cry. I may be afraid. But, I do know what happens to him after I die.

He dies.

And Jesus wins in the end.

"There is a time for everything, and a season for every activity under heaven: a time to be born and a time to die ..." (Ecclesiastes 3:1,2a)

K-State should look past architectural establishment

Interviewing Michael Graves, a prominent East Coast architect, to design the Alumni Center is a vote for the establishment.

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

RUSSELL FORTMEYER is a senior in architectural engineering. You can send e-mail to Russell at rmf@ksu.edu

The state of Kansas might not have produced any great masters of architecture, but that shouldn't stop us from trying.

Perhaps it is our unwillingness to give our grand projects to locals instead of vying for some sort of silly, superficial national recognition and choosing a name architect with an international reputation.

The city of Wichita recently confirmed this state affliction by giving its science center project to Moshe Safdie, a Canadian modernist, of all things. And he produced an elegant design, if somewhat inappropriate to the weather of Kansas.

Why didn't the commission go to a Kansan? Because Wichita is a progressive city, and progressive cities need great architectural statements by great international architects to legitimize civic pride.

The folly in this is that if Wichita ever hopes to emerge from its style-less architectural doldrums, it needs to begin developing local talent. Bringing in a master will not spark a revolution. Letting local architects grow and develop personal styles might.

Much closer to home, the KSU Alumni Association is venturing into Wichita territory by interviewing Michael Graves for its future Alumni Center project.

Apparently, Graves is teaming with a Topeka architectural firm for consideration on the proposed project. He would act as the design architect while the local firm carried out the usual housekeeping associated with building. He recently completed designs for the expansion of the Topeka Public Library in the same manner.

Graves, along with the more theoretical Robert Venturi, represents the East Coast architectural establishment in its fullest expression: an architect who is beloved by corporate America for giving it symbols and logos.

Graves's design for the Walt Disney World Swan and Dolphin Hotels are not as much plays of form as they are grand surface treatments — a painted ocean wave here, an allusion to Florida there. The towering dolphins and swans are corporate logos as architecture.

It's likely the university would like to see another name architect, akin to its desire for the extremely loose connection derived between Charles Moore and the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. From President Jon Wefald's standpoint, at K-State a name architect implies world-class buildings.

As any student or person with a vague interest in architecture knows, even the association or full-involvement of a so-called master of architecture does not necessarily produce great results.

I've said it before: the Beach Museum is as much a Moore building as Holton Hall is a Henry Hobson Richardson. In each case, the great architects' style and approach informed the buildings (less-so in Holton because Richardson was not remotely involved), but the final results achieved were someone else's ultimate vision.

The reasons Graves has succeeded as an architect are relatively simple. He has developed a personal style that can be endlessly repeated throughout the world in a number of contexts, although somehow, mysteriously, all of his buildings end up looking similar.

He has also been crowned by enough critics, developers and writers as a great architect that he is a safe choice for corporations. He's a more personal Philip Johnson, not as willing to bend to the way the wind is blowing, which is what sadly passes for dignity in the world of name architecture.

This trait was most realized in his awful, pitiful proposal for an addition to Marcel Breuer's Whitney Museum of Art in New York City.

Graves proposed what basically would call for the marginalization and figurative destruction of Breuer's modernist masterpiece. It was as if the utmost expression of the postmodern movement (Graves) was having a revenge on a modern master.

After a public outcry, the proposal was trashed. However, it remains that Graves can be insensitive.

While it might be de riguer for American campuses to commission name architecture in a kind of sick one-upmanship, it would hardly begin to address the architectural needs of K-State.

If there are administrators who haven't liked the recent additions to campus by local architects, perhaps they need to be reminded there are other architects in Kansas and even, dare I suggest, at this university.

If a bold architectural statement is needed for a future campus project, let one of our own make it. Astonishing, innovative visions need not be purchased from the establishment but can often be found when one allows the self to become fully realized.

Study to address traffic, parking

LANDON TRAWNEY
staff reporter

K-State and Manhattan will begin a transportation study by the end of the year to address parking and traffic problems in the area, said Thomas Swenson, senior associate of TranSystems, a traffic study company.

University and Manhattan officials met Tuesday with members of the TranSystems Corp. to discuss the main issues and concerns of K-State and Manhattan. The TranSystems Corp. was chosen earlier this summer to do the study.

TranSystems will consider the needs of emergency response vehicles, the airport, neighborhoods, Riley County and K-State.

Swenson said the study will explore possible advantages of combining a transit system with Junction City and other surrounding communities. He also said TranSystems wants to find out if Manhattan has a large enough population to qualify for federal funding.

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said he was pleased that K-State will participate in the transportation study.

"It impacts us as we impact the rest of the community," Abbott said.

Abbott said he would like the study to show how improvements can be made toward safety on campus, congestion and traffic flow. He also said he hopes the study will show whether a parking garage or shuttle system could take care of future parking requirements.

Mark Taussig, university landscape architect, said he wants to try to increase the use of bicycles and walking on campus to take pressure off parking problems.

"It is something we can do at no great cost," Taussig said.

Black Student Union gears up for Homecoming

KERRY BOYDSTON
staff reporter

The Black Student Union is recruiting members to show off their artistic abilities and volunteer for K-State Homecoming activities.

"All it takes is some time, creativeness or even just someone who can draw a straight line," Colette McLemore, president of BSU, said at Tuesday's BSU Homecoming activities planning meeting.

This year, BSU members will participate as an organization in the banner, Pant the Chant and parade categories.

"This is a fun time. We want BSU members to come together and show their pride during Homecoming," McLemore said.

For this year's Homecoming week activities, BSU members might be showing their unity in a new way. McLemore said she wants all members to be at the parade Saturday morning dressed in BSU T-shirts and walk with their banner to show off their pride.

"I don't think we've had shirts since my freshman year. It's a fun idea, and I think it's time to get new ones," she said. "All we need is to get a count of all the members who want shirts so we can get them ordered in time."

BSU members at the Homecoming planning meeting were also encouraged to attend the pep rallies and the body-building competition, even though they will not be participating this year.

"We are participating a little more this year than in the past. If we go and watch these events, we may even decide to participate more in the future," Verneta White, senior in life sciences, said. "We have a younger group than before and there seems to be a lot more excitement about the activities than in the past."

White said Homecoming activities help all black organizations on campus.

"Most of us are members in black organizations and by coming together and doing Homecoming as BSU, we are creating a stronger bond between black organizations."

Professor on leave for remark about Texas minority students

ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT WORTH, Texas — A University of North Texas professor was placed on paid leave after telling a campus forum that minority students have poor class attendance habits.

Don Staples, a broadcast and film professor, apologized for the comment he made during a discussion Friday on how to advance the university. About 200 students, faculty and staff were attending.

"My remark was an unfair generalization about minority students enrolled at the university," Staples told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram. "I hope people understand how apologetic I am."

But on Monday, UNT Chancellor Alfred Hurley issued a memo that said racism will not be tolerated.

"We support and defend in every way possible the right of free speech here," Hurley said. "At the same time, we recognize that the well-being of this community and our nation depends on our striving to speak factually and civilly."

School officials said Staples likely won't return to work until after an Oct. 10 diversity workshop he has pledged to attend. The university in Denton has 25,026 students, including 1,871 blacks and 1,645 Hispanics.

Staples, who has been at UNT since 1979, said he does not recall his exact words. He said he was addressing a concern raised by a black student about contributions by minorities not being acknowledged in classroom lectures.

Staples said he tried to say that some of his former minority students had missed lectures on the contributions of various ethnic groups to film.

"He made a very inappropriate comment about an entire group of people," said Cassandra Berry, assistant vice president of the university. "He actually said minority students did not attend class."

It was the second controversial

Volleyball set to battle KU

▸ TEAM WANTS MOMENTUM FROM successes against Team USA to carry on.

SAM FELSENFELD
staff reporter

Two matches, two losses.

The K-State volleyball team hasn't exactly set the Big 12 Conference on fire during its week of competition.

However, the Wildcats say they improve during every game of every match. And tonight, they'll get another chance to pick up their first conference win of the season when they travel to play Kansas at 7 p.m.

The Cats lost their conference opener Friday to Colorado and dropped another match to Nebraska on Saturday, both by 3-1 scores.

The team played an exhibition match against the USA National Team on Monday, and although K-State lost, it improved while stepping their competition up to the level of the opponent — the best team in the country.

Now, as they prepare for the Jayhawks, the Cats will try to keep their intensity level high as they did when they scored 14 points in the second game of the match with the national team.

"Hopefully, we'll keep this up," freshman middle blocker Kelle Branting said. "This is a good time for us, just getting into conference play."

K-State coach Jim McLaughlin doesn't expect the team to suffer a letdown when it faces Kansas, a slower opponent than the national team.

"We've been preaching from day one that it's not the opponent on the other side of the net, it's how we play and the standards we set," he said. "If we meet our standards, we're going to win. And we're going to win a lot of games, because we're a good team. We're not going to adjust our tactics to KU."

The Cats say they are on track to peak in November and December, when the NCAA Tournament rolls around.

However, they need to pick up wins before the last month of the season to make the tournament, and McLaughlin said there are no guarantees in the Big 12.

"In this conference, there's a sense of urgency every night out," he said.

Still, he said the team has improved after competing against Colorado, Nebraska and the National Team, and is ready to move up in the standings. He also said the team doesn't have any confidence problems after losing three matches in four nights.

"They know we're better," he said. "The team knows there's areas we need to improve in, and they know that we're gonna get there. We're good enough right now that if we play well, we can get some Ws."

One problem the Cats showed against Nebraska was defending against tips by opposing offenses.

The Cornhuskers exploited that weakness and defeated K-State in four games, consistently tipping and catching the Cats off guard. This came after the two teams battled it out to open the match, power vs. power, with K-State taking the game 16-14.

"That was something that really frustrated us Saturday night, and that's something that we talked about in our meeting after the game," junior middle blocker Val Wieck said. "That's something we want to read and react on. It's just a matter of being disciplined."

However, the Cats made adjustments in practice, and don't expect to let a close match get out of hand again. They played tougher against tips against the national team, not letting it take over the match without using its power.

"We're gonna run down tips," McLaughlin said. "We're gonna get on our horse and run 'em down."

VAL WIECK, K-State middle blocker, hits the ball past Micki Hurley of the USA National Team. Despite Wieck's efforts, the Cat's lost in three straight games.

Iowa's A boat won the division with a time of 16:58. K-State's Seaton finished fourth with a time of 17:18, and the Housatonic finished sixth in 18:22.

Novotna and senior Yana Dorodnova started doubles play Tuesday. They faced Baylor's team of Hortensia Hernandez and Sophie Goldschmidt in the first round of the qualifying draw.

Dorodnova also began singles play Tuesday, taking on No. 2-seed Angela Lawrence of Pepperdine.

Cats prepare for hostile Nebraska environment

JESS C. LOUK
staff writer

Nebraska fans might have booed quarterback Scott Frost earlier this season, but that doesn't mean he doesn't like to line up under center at Memorial Stadium.

"It's going to be a lot better playing in Nebraska opposed to Washington," Frost said.

Why shouldn't Frost like playing at Memorial Stadium? The No. 3-ranked Huskers hold the nation's longest home winning streak. The last time Nebraska lost at home was to the Washington Huskies in 1991. The Huskies were ranked No. 4 at the time.

The next week, the unranked Wildcats rolled into Lincoln and lost.

Since then, Nebraska has won the past 38 games played on its home field. Deafening crowd noise and the famous sea of red always greet opponents traveling to Lincoln.

"It's not that big of a deal to me. I'd rather play at home than away," Nebraska Coach Tom Osborne said. "But I don't mind playing away."

When Osborne's Huskers play at home, Memorial Stadium sold out 217 consecutive times. In the past five years, Nebraska has gone 53-3 at home. That's an NCAA record.

For their part, the Wildcats do not have to be reminded that Memorial is a difficult place to play. The last time the Cats rolled into Lincoln, in 1995, they were ranked No. 8 in the nation. Nebraska treated them like unranked, unwelcome visitors, smashing the Cats 49-25 and knocking them out of the top 10.

In that game, the Huskers scored five straight touchdowns. K-State was held to negative rushing yards.

"If you want to beat Nebraska at home, you've really got to suck it up and play like it's the biggest game of your life," K-State linebacker Travis Ochs said. "We just have to go out there and execute for 60 minutes."

To help prepare for the noise K-State will encounter, Coach Bill Snyder said the Cats have been practicing with artificial crowd noise broadcast over KSU Stadium's public address system. The Cats practiced during the summer once with the noise, again on Monday, and plan to on Thursday. But he said the team's focus should be on execution, not on a hostile crowd.

"If you are focused on the crowd, you might as well not get on the bus," Snyder said. "It's a matter of keeping your focus on the field."

The simulated crowd noise has made communication a little more difficult than in a normal week. Snyder said coaches have had to be closer to the players to give instruction while the noise is on.

The Cats can take solace in the fact that the last time they beat the Huskers was at Memorial Stadium. Unfortunately for the Cats, it was Nov. 9, 1968. That was also the last time the Huskers were held scoreless at home.

Since then, the Cats have lost 28 straight games to the Huskers. Since Osborne has coached Nebraska, his teams have never lost to the Cats, with a record of 24-0. Even with the streak and the history of the match-up, the Huskers are not taking the Cats lightly.

"Anybody can beat anybody on any week," Frost said. "We have to take care of our business, and when we do, we don't feel like people are going to be able to beat us."

Don't get your hopes up, Wildcat faithful; Nebraska is too good

VIEWPOINT

CRESTON KUENZI

CRESTON KUENZI is a junior in computer engineering. You can send your e-mail to Creston at creston@ksu.edu.

It's time for our annual reality check, my fellow Wildcat fans.

I am, of course, referring to the game this Saturday night against the mighty Nebraska Cornhuskers.

Every year, we go into this game with the hope of an upset that would vault the Cats into the midst of the elite teams in the nation, only to have that hope brutally crushed by the Big Red Machine.

As much as I hate to say it, it doesn't look like it's going to be any different this year.

I know I should have a better attitude about the game. I should have faith that the Cats will go into Lincoln and shock the nation by beating the Huskers for the first time since 1968. After all, the Cats did look impressive in the 58-0 thumping of Bowling Green on Saturday.

I guess 28 straight losses to the Huskers have the tendency to bring out the pessimist in me. I think it's going to be a completely different story for the Cats this week.

Against Bowling Green, the Cats relied heavily on their huge size advantage to overpower the Falcons in the running game, while mixing in a pass here and there. To beat Nebraska, the Cats will have to go to the air much more frequently because the Huskers are never overpowered by anyone.

Having to pass so much wouldn't be a concern, except I'm wondering whether the receiving corps can even catch a cold after dropping so many passes during the first three games.

You know, a couple of weeks ago I wasn't nearly so pessimistic about this weekend's showdown.

The Huskers were far from stellar in a 38-24 win over supposed doormat Central Florida, and I began to wonder whether they had slipped a little. However, any doubts about Nebraska's ability were quickly erased in my mind after it handed the No. 2 Washington Huskies a 27-14 defeat on the road.

Now the Cats have to confront a rested No. 3 Nebraska team that has had two weeks to prepare. In addition, the game is being played in Huskerland. By the way, I will be experiencing a Nebraska home game in person for the first time Saturday.

I'll actually be sitting with some Nebraska fans I know, so look for me on television. I'll be the drop of purple in the sea of red.

I know this has been an awfully negative column, so for all of you out there who still have faith the Cats can win, I've come up with two scenarios in which they have a shot.

1. Nebraska coach Tom Osborne becomes ill after eating a bad burrito during the pregame meal and deliriously calls for a pooch kick on every single play.

I know it sounds a little far-fetched, but if I can just figure out how to sneak into their cafeteria, there's a chance.

2. The Cornhuskers play a below-average game, and the Wildcats play a perfect game.

To play a perfect game, the special teams have to be solid, the offense must execute without turnovers and the defense must slow down the Huskers' offense while forcing turnovers.

Fulfilling the special teams requirement shouldn't be a problem with James Garcia handling the punting responsibilities, Lamar Chapman returning punts and Martin "Automatica" Gramatica splitting the uprights.

The other two parts of the equation for the perfect game are where the Cats will probably have the most difficulty.

I would like nothing better than to have to eat my words after a K-State victory. In fact, I would ravenously devour my words if the Cats could win. I just don't have much confidence that the Cats can go into Lincoln and beat the Huskers without some divine intervention.

Anybody have a chef's hat I can borrow?

Farrell's legacy

The history of K-State's library

Francis D. Farrell

1858 — Bluemont Central College is founded, and the school's library is housed in the college's only building.

1863 — Bluemont Central College is taken over by the state, and Kansas State Agricultural College is born. KSAC assumes Bluemont's assets, including a library of about 3,000 books. The library keeps its spot in the original Bluemont building.

1877 — 1,225 of the library's more valuable volumes are transferred from the Bluemont building to Professor M.L. Ward's classroom in Farm Machinery Hall. Other books remained in the original library.

1879 — All of the library's volumes are moved again, this time to the north wing of Anderson Hall, which had just been constructed. The library was in the northeast corner of Anderson's first floor.

1894 — Construction of Library and Agricultural Science Hall (later to be named Fairchild) is completed. All volumes were again moved, this time across the street from Anderson to Fairchild.

1902 — The Library and Agricultural Science Hall is renamed Fairchild Hall, in honor of George T. Fairchild, Kansas State Agricultural College president from 1879 to 1897.

1924 — A document titled "Arguements (sic) for a New Library at K.S.A.C." is submitted to K-State President William M. Jardine. According to the document, there wasn't enough room for the 80,000 volumes or for students among the 300 seats in the library, which was still in Fairchild Hall.

January 1926 — Ground is broken for the construction of the new library (later to be named Farrell Library), which would triple the seating capacity of the Fairchild location.

1927 — Construction of the new library building is completed, and 85,450 volumes make the move from Fairchild Hall to the new location. Final cost of the new building: $270,000.

1943 — The library's needs begin to outgrow the original structure. Arthur Bourne Smith, librarian from 1911 to 1943, was later quoted as saying, "By 1943, the stacks were already crowded."

1954 — To remedy the situation, an eight-story stacks addition was completed at a cost of $340,000. The new addition housed 580,000 volumes. It was connected to the south side of the original building.

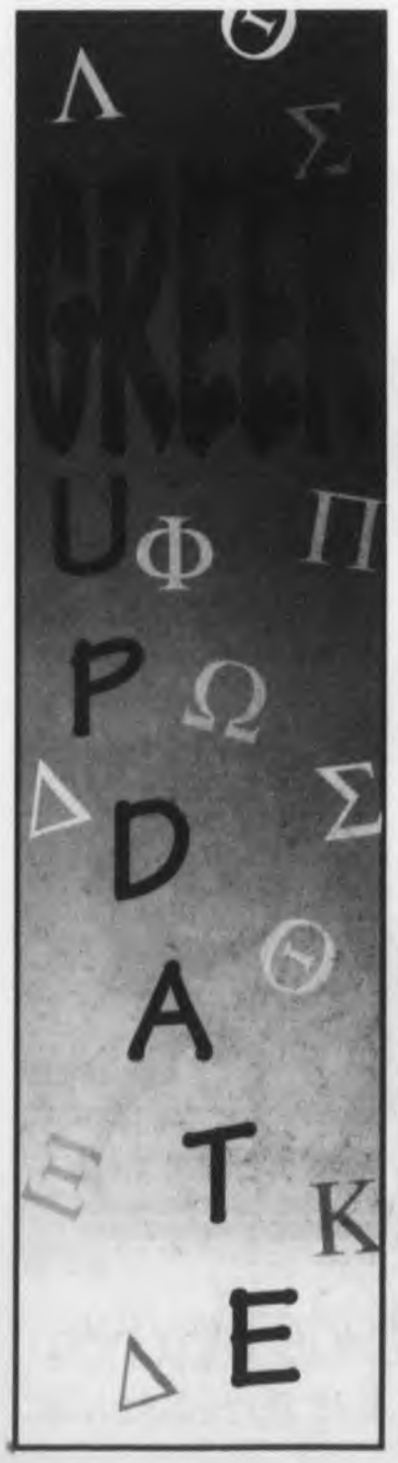
1955 — The stacks addition is dedicated, and the entire structure is named in honor of Francis David Farrell, university president from 1925 to 1944. In Farrell's eulogy in 1976, K-State President James A. McCain said, "Dr. Farrell was a literate man in the broadest sense of the word ... it was this aspect of his personality that led to the choice of the university library, the intellectual center of the campus, as his permanent memorial."

1968 — University officials announce the next proposed addition to Farrell Library, a $2.25 million project to add 100,000 square feet to the building. Plans for the addition included a 24-hour study hall and a computer system, to keep better track of books and fines. Construction was set to begin that summer.

1970 — The second addition to Farrell Library is completed. It connects to the southeast side of the original building.

February 1979 — After problems with water leaks, a lack of space and other difficulties, a Student Senate task force begins studying ways to boost Farrell from its ranking as the worst of the Big 8 libraries.

1989 — Ten years after the task force's study, Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock predicts that the available space for books will be filled by 1993. Books are shifted around Farrell Library because engineers warned that the building's floors were overloaded from the weight of the books. A satellite book storage facility for 200,000 older volumes is created in the basement of Nichols Hall.



Spring, 1990 — Student Body President Todd Johnson organizes Students Helping Enhance Library Funding, which organizes a student walkout and sit-in at the library. At the sit-in, Regent Charles Hosteller, Manhattan, criticizes the KSU Foundation for its lack of support for library fund raising.

1991 — Consultants recommend that Farrell Library be doubled in size at an estimated cost of $28 million. President Jon Wefald said money for expansion could be raised from state or private sources. Later in the year, Student Senate passes a referendum to redirect $5 million of student bond money to the library.

1992 — The Kansas Legislature accepts Gov. Joan Finney's recommendation that $18 million of federal money be committed to the Farrell expansion.

August 1994 — Construction of Hale Library begins. The project was completed in April 1997 and will be formally dedicated in a ceremony Sunday afternoon.

SARAH GLASER, junior in wildlife biology and member of the varsity debate team, recently placed sixth in the 1997 USC Debate.

SARAH GLASER

Science knowledge helps debater

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

Enthusiastic. Positive. Interested. Creative.

All adjectives used to describe Sarah Glaser, junior in wildlife biology and varsity debate team member.

When Glaser came here three years ago, she was immediately placed on the varsity debate squad. Susan Stanfield, director of debate for K-State, said that is unusual.

Stanfield said Glaser is creative in terms of finding new ways to argue old points.

"Coming out of high school, Sarah was already very technically proficient," Stanfield said.

As a freshman, Glaser was not only placed on the varsity squad, she was teamed with the top debater from K-State. This year, her partner is Isaac West, junior in speech.

There are three styles of debate: Lincoln-Douglas, cross examination and parliamentary debate. Glaser participates in cross-examination, or policy debate.

She likes this style of debate because it requires fast talking and has a laid-back approach.

The K-State debate team participates in more than 15 tournaments every year. Since joining the squad in 1994, Glaser has placed in all but two tournaments.

Stanfield credits this incredible success to talent.

Christina Sabee, graduate teaching assistant for the debate team and Glaser's roommate, said there are two things that make Glaser unusual.

First, she is the only team member with a scientific and environmental background.

Because all other team members have backgrounds in the social sciences, she is the person to ask when these issues are being debated.

Second, until this year, she was the only woman on the team.

Each year, the debate team must argue a topic in one category. This year it will debate issues related to Southeast Asia.

Glaser has also debated on foreign policy regarding Mexico and environmental regulations on U.S. industry, which Glaser said was her favorite topic.

Sabee said Glaser works hard.

"Sarah has one of the hardest schedules out of all the debaters," Sabee said. "Most debaters are on campus two to three hours a day, Sarah is on campus all day."

Glaser said she works on debate an average of five hours a day. The amount of time she spends is determined by when the next tournament is. If a tournament is scheduled, she sets everything aside and prepares only for it in the days before the event.

"It makes school really hard," Glaser said. "We take off for a lot of tournaments."

The debate team travels to tournaments in both the fall and spring semesters. It also travels to tournaments during winter break, and nationals take place during spring break. This schedule leaves only a few free weekends during the school year.

In addition to debate, Glaser works in a lab at Bushnell Hall for a biology professor.

Glaser said the two things she's learned from debate are applying research to debates and ways to see both sides of the issue.

"I came here because I used to be in engineering," Glaser said. "I knew people on the K-State team. They had a solid team with a good history, and I knew they would do well."

After graduating, Glaser plans to attend graduate school in either environmental law or environmental policy.

Lafene move still possible; planning, funds needed

ANDREA COREY
senior staff writer

Lafene Health Center might move from campus to Mercy Health Center on Sunset Avenue. Then again, it might not.

It's just too early to tell, in the opinions of officials at Lafene and Mercy Health Center.

"Everything is in consideration. We talked about this last academic year," Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene, said. "We put the plan on hold for a while."

Zweimiller seems hopeful — he said his staff has a plan to move no sooner than two years from now.

But the move is by no means definite.

"It isn't something that is imminent," Mike Nunamaker, CEO of Mercy Health Center, said.

The problem is that there isn't enough space. Mercy on Sunset and College avenues, each housed as separate hospitals, aren't big enough for all the services, Nunamaker said.

He said the plan to combine hospitals would mean both would still be used for an extended period of time after the initial merger with Mercy on College.

After that extended period of time, moving Lafene might be a possibility.

"In the long term, we will not give up the possibility that as we move to a single facility, Lafene Health Center would eventually move," Nunamaker said.

One of the benefits of Lafene moving to Mercy on Sunset is an issue of square footage.

"We have all our space utilized fully at this time. We can't really alter it. We can't expand to add a service," Dr. Guy Smith, medical director at Lafene, said.

Smith said most outpatient clinics have three or four exam rooms per doctor to allow for the best patient turnover.

He said physicians at Lafene have one exam room and an office, and that lack of space causes problems.

"It interferes. It makes us less effective and less efficient," he said.

The lack of square footage isn't necessarily solved by Lafene moving to Mercy on Sunset.

That extra footage needs to be properly designed as outpatient clinic space. Mercy on Sunset was not designed as an outpatient clinic.

"I do have a concern that even though we might have more square footage, it isn't designed as outpatient square footage," Smith said.

Smith said it would take planning and adequate funds for the necessary remodeling.

Remodeling isn't the only concern regarding the possible Lafene move.

Students would have to get to the Sunset location, and that could prove more difficult than walking to Lafene at the center of campus.

"It's going to be a little less convenient," Zweimiller said. "We'd have some shuttle service available."

He said most students plan on being at Lafene ahead of time, so they might be able to plan for a ride with a friend or get the shuttle.

He added that one of the biggest complaints about Lafene is the lack of parking near the building — he said the Mercy on Sunset location would probably solve that problem.

While the move might solve some problems, Zweimiller said a benefit of the move would be the possibility of new services.

"If we see a need to add a new service, this will give us an option to entertain the idea."

Child porn sting leads to 31 prosecutions

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — A college student training to become a kindergarten teacher and a school janitor were among 1,500 people suspected of sending child pornography on the Internet, federal and state investigators said.

The 18-month Operation Rip Cord already has led to the prosecution of 31 people nationwide, state Attorney General Dennis Vacco said Monday.

"With these prosecutions, we have put child pornographers on notice that New York won't ignore this illegal activity, which threatens the safety of our children," Vacco said.

Arrested last week in the sting was Christopher Black, 21, a janitor who allegedly used a New York City school principal's computer to transmit at least four pornographic images of children to state investigators.

Nathaniel Levy, 21, a student at the State University of New York at Albany studying to be a teacher, admitted in May to promoting a sexual performance by a child.

He allegedly transmitted about three dozen photos depicting infants and small children engaged in sex acts in return for promises of a pornographic videotape.

Levy was arrested by an undercover agent posing as a UPS employee when he signed for the videotape at his residence hall room.

Neither Black nor Levy was accused of producing the pictures they allegedly transmitted.

The probe also uncovered child pornography traffickers in Germany, Switzerland and Great Britain but did not locate any producers. America Online, the nation's largest Internet service provider, assisted in identifying those who used its service, officials said.

Former vice squad detectives from the attorney general's office in Buffalo teamed with U.S. Customs Service employees to crack computer codes and pose as adult bookstore owners to locate suspects.

Investigators were so disgusted by the material coming across their screens that they once ripped a computer plug from the wall, giving the sting its name.

One investigator, Michael McCartney, said the images were so disturbing that he had trouble sleeping at night for several weeks at the beginning of the sting.

Many of the 200,000 images seized in the sting appeared to be recently created, which Vacco said pointed to a resurgence of victimization of children.

The investigation's goal "is to protect kids, not to go after people exercising their First Amendment rights," Vacco said.

Measure for Measure

Public: $18, Seniors: $16, Students: $9

Will Isabella trade her virginity for her brother's life? That's her dilemma as she pleads to save her brother, who has been sentenced to death for impregnating his unmarried lover. It may sound like an R-rated movie, but this, folks, is Shakespeare.

Measure for Measure is one of Shakespeare's most well-crafted plays, but is often overlooked in favor of the more famous tragedies, histories, and comedies. By today's standards it is a "dark" comedy that probes both the relationship of law and morality in the state and human behavior under stress. Don't miss out when Actors from the London Stage perform this morally intriguing play.

Playing the game

Local group of gamers spends free time discovering new board games

LESLEY BAKER
staff writer

The group of seven sat mostly isolated from each other; three over in one corner, three in the front row, one in the back. The figure at the front of the room was the one they focused on.

With a sigh and a blink, he announced that the Dungeons & Dragons game scheduled for tonight was off. The person that was supposed to run it was at home working on a presentation.

Elements of Fantasy, the on-campus gaming group, met last Monday to discuss upcoming games and conventions.

The gaming group has been in existence for four years with various names: Star Riders and Secret Masters of Fandom.

"We changed the name in hopes of changing our image a little bit," Jim Wilkins, president and junior in information science, said. "If anyone wants to play poker or board games, we'd love to have them."

"We're more than just a role-playing group," Pat McDonald, faculty adviser, said. "We do card games. We're really interested in a lot of things. We have people that read and talk about science-fiction novels. The club's focus is pretty diverse. We've had guests come in and talk about fiction. We have movie nights."

"We're pretty much into gaming of all sorts," Wilkins said. "We've had nights when we play board games like Monopoly. As far as playing D & D, we like to include that."

What is it about gaming that has kept this group together for four years?

"Gaming's been big since 1970, 1978," Stephen Elder, owner of The Gamer, a comic, role-playing figurine shop, said. "It's a great social way to meet people. Whole core of friends are made out of gaming groups. You can pull everyone together."

"With a fantasy game you can do things that you can't do in real life. You can play this road warrior who comes in and cuts the bad guys in half with your sword. You can be the hero. You can be the bad guy."

"When I first came to Manhattan," Wilkins said, "the gaming group was kind of cliquish. Part of the reason for this group is to break that. We're here to have fun, to play chess and any other thing. It's one of the funniest activities I've been involved in. I want other people to enjoy the fun, too. I don't want to keep it all to myself."

Concerning the bad reputation that sometimes surrounds gaming, Wilkins said, "Recently the White Wolf Vampire (The Masquerade) game got mentioned in the news. Some kids killed their parents. My reaction was where were their parents when they were getting this information? There's some games that are just adult issues."

Wilkens said the group is trying to reach out to different people.

"We do have members who are interested in fiction and science-fiction," Wilkins said. "We're trying to lure the English majors in. We're interested in getting the literary people into our group because we're kind of lacking in science-fiction and fantasy."

As for their next publicity event, Nov. 22, a convention will be in the KSU Ballroom of the K-State Student Union.

There will be comic book vendors and a swap table where you can trade comics. Card tournaments will also be played.

The card games chosen so far are Magic, Legend of the Rings and Highlander.

"We were looking at adding some of the role-playing stuff into the convention," Wilkins said.

"This is the first one we're trying to put together. We're a little disorganized but piling forward."

LOCAL MUSIC SERIES WORKS FOR ITS SUCCESS

SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
staff writer

Ask the founders of BirdHouse Productions, and they'll tell you that their hobby is the best kept secret in Manhattan — whether they like it or not.

"The hardest part had been letting the world know we're here," said David Kamerer, BirdHouse founder and assistant professor of journalism and mass communications.

Kamerer, a fan of the Lawrence music scene in general and the folk/acoustic genre in specific, said he had played around with the idea regularly of bringing the same sort of music to the Manhattan area.

But it wasn't until he made connections with people involved with other established music series like "Radio Bob" McWilliams and Miner Seymur that the idea started to sound more realistic.

"We can't get people to come out and play just for us," Kamerer said, but added that when several tours exist in Manhattan, struggling musicians can afford to tour in Kansas.

So, with co-founders Director of Disabled Student Services Gretchen Holden and Associate Director of Intramurals Steve Martini, BirdHouse Productions was born in spring 1995.

"I was a '60s kid," Holden said "I grew up with acoustical guitar and music so my motivation was very selfish. It was the only way I was going to be able to hear that music (in Manhattan)."

Initially, Holden said, the three were never sure exactly how great attendance would be. "We knew there was an audience out there, but we had to reach them," Martini said.

"We used to hold our breath," Holden said.

Holden also said that in early concerts, the founders wondered if ticket sales would cover costs for the musicians, or if they would have to pay out of their own pockets.

They never did though. "It became clearly evident that we could get quality entertainment in Manhattan," Martini said.

In fact, minus a few disruptions, the audience has been steadily growing with an average attendance of 110. Martini said the 1997 fall season has already sold 32 season tickets. The results are impressive when, Holden said, BirdHouse's budget doesn't allow for much more than a few fliers and word-of-mouth reputation for advertising.

Overall, the main assets to keeping BirdHouse alive have been teamwork with other series statewide and the dedication of the many volunteers helping the tour, Kamerer said. As for the success on a concert-to-concert basis, the founders attribute it to both the musicians and their stage environment.

"I think the quality rests on the shoulders of the artists themselves," Holden said "My observation is that they live on a shoestring. It's not a cushy life so we appreciate these artists and try to take care of them while they're here."

BirdHouse is continually working with up-and-coming artists that have built a reputation but are still affordable for the nonprofit organization.

"This isn't high dollar stuff. (The musicians) do it because they love it," Martini said.

He said he thought the down-to-earth and undubbed nature of the music is what has made the crowds grow. "It's just the artist and their instrument," Martini said.

Kamerer also considers the small, almost intimate stage setting of the Manhattan Center for the Arts, where most of BirdHouse concerts are performed, to be an important asset.

"It's crucial to our success that you can sit so close to the artist and the artist can interact with the audience," Kamerer said. "I'd go so far as to say that it's almost as important as the music itself."

This season, BirdHouse already has had a Sept. 5 double performance by Greg Greenway and Don Conoscenti and is preparing for its third annual benefit concert in cooperation with Habitat for Humanity this Saturday.

Although the concert, featuring Pierce Pettis, is not officially part of the BirdHouse series, the usual staff is organizing the event along with Habitat members for the show at St. Thomas

Kayaga dances at Forum Hall

LESLEY BAKER
staff reporter

More than 70 people experienced Africa on Tuesday night in Forum Hall. A group called Kayaga, consisting of three performers from Uganda, brought the song, costumes, dance and instruments of eastern and central Africa to K-State.

In its performance of both ritualistic and modern song and dance, each piece seemed to have a story attached.

"Bakisimba" was a song and dance created after the King of Southern Uganda got drunk on banana alcohol. As he was walking through the village, singing to himself, the women and men of the village added their own movements to break the sheer boredom of hearing their king brag about himself.

"Entogoro" was a dance created by bored young boys watching the family livestock. They found pods with seeds in them that rattled when they were shaken. They gathered dozens of these pods and strapped them to their legs, creating different dances for their amusement. Then the women showed up. To out-do the boys, they took strips of cloth, wrapped them around their waists and performed graceful waist dances as a rivalry between the sexes.

Other songs seemed to be created out of everyday life. There was a song about a man who sold rotten fish, a dance created

Expansion, renovation of Farrell increases studying space

JACOB JANSONIUS
staff writer

Ten percent of K-State's student body could settle in, but there would be little noise. There is only one place on campus where this could happen — Farrell Library.

Because Farrell, which will officially become Hale Library on Sunday, has expanded its seating capacity from 850 to 2,000, students will have much more area to explore. The five-story library has expanded study areas on every floor, and now there are special rooms for conferences.

Rod Jerrick, senior in agribusiness, said the library expansion was important.

"Students need to know that they can use the library for meetings and studying. With all the new space, we can really use the library to our advantage," he said.

There are four floors where students can study. The first four floors have tables and chairs around the outside for students studying alone. The center is designated for books and other resources.

The first floor has a 24-hour study area that not only provides students with a quiet place to study, but also provides snack machines for students with the munchies.

"The first floor is the only floor we allow food on. We thought it would be good for students to be able to have a place to get something if they got hungry studying," said Jan Crow, director of marketing and public relations.

The first floor also has data terminals for students to plug in personal computers. A total of 1,800 data terminal jacks were added to the new library.

The second and third floors have study carrels for students to do individual work. There are 12 carrels on each floor, and they are divided into sections of three each.

Lindsay Cochran, senior in life sciences, said the individual carrels really help her focus on her work without distraction.

"I use the third floor a lot. It's a great place to sit and read," Cochran said.

The third floor also features the library's oldest room, the Cathedral Room. The Cathedral Room is a Gothic-style room that is part of the original Farrell Library built in 1927. The room has been refurbished to match the rest of the library, and four murals painted in 1934 decorate the south wall. The room can be used by students who want to study alone or in groups.

"I've been to that room with my friends to study for tests. The nice thing about it is that the tables and big enough to seat a lot of people," Jerrick said.

The Hemisphere Room is also an important addition to the library. The room, on the fifth floor, is used for library events and meetings.

Crow said the library needed a place to meet for important business.

"You have to sign up for the room at the circulation desk, and it is free if the meeting being held has a library purpose," Crow said. "Other people can use the room for a fee between $35 and $75 per hour."

Tower rooms can also be rented by groups. There are tower rooms on both the third and fourth floors. These circular rooms are also free if the group's discussion involves a library purpose. The tower rooms, unlike the Hemisphere room, are not multi-purpose meeting rooms because they are smaller in size.

"Functionally, we can now grow with the needs of the library," Crow said. "We have a lot more flexibility."

Chelsea Clinton column causes firing

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PALO ALTO, Calif. — Don't ask. Don't tell. And, as a Stanford Daily columnist learned, don't voice your opinion — if your subject is Chelsea Clinton.

Jesse Oxfield, a senior at Stanford, lost his job at the student newspaper after writing about the first daughter in a column his boss considered a violation of her strict policy of not covering the president's daughter.

He wrote an opinion piece about the media coverage of Chelsea's arrival Sept. 19, accompanied by her parents. Hundreds of reporters descended on campus but were kept at a distance from the Clintons, who wanted to be like any other family seeing a child off to college.

"First, why, precisely, is it that we're all expected to bend over backward to give Chelsea and her family a 'normal' Stanford experience while the first family itself is under no similar obligation?" Oxfield wrote.

He also criticized the Daily's rule of not writing about Chelsea unless she does something newsworthy, or something that the paper would write about if she were just anyone else.

Oxfield called the rule "Clintonian."

He described it like this: "Don't ask (anything about her life), don't tell (anyone outside the campus what you might happen to discover about her life), don't pursue (her, at all.)"

Stanford Daily editor in chief Carolyn Sleeth decided Oxfield's column didn't fit in with the paper's guidelines for covering Chelsea. She killed the column on Thursday, after the writer refused to revise it.

Oxfield, previously the paper's managing editor, may not be without other journalistic options. Since Chelsea announced she was going to Stanford, he has discussed her choice for National Public Radio, Time magazine and the Today Show, among others.

'Peacemaker' good film, just not what advertised

BYRON VOGEL
staff reporter

A Bosnian parliament member is shot to death outside his church. Two trains collide on a rural Eastern European hillside. One carries unsuspecting passengers. The other carries 20 murdered Russian soldiers and a ticking nuclear warhead. A rogue Russian general navigates a small truck carrying another batch of warheads toward the Iraqi border. Half an hour and one nuclear meltdown later, we still have no idea what "The Peacemaker" is about.

Movie Review

In this, the debut film from DreamWorks SKG, George Clooney plays Tom Devoe, a globetrotting Army intelligence officer in pursuit of the heisted nukes.

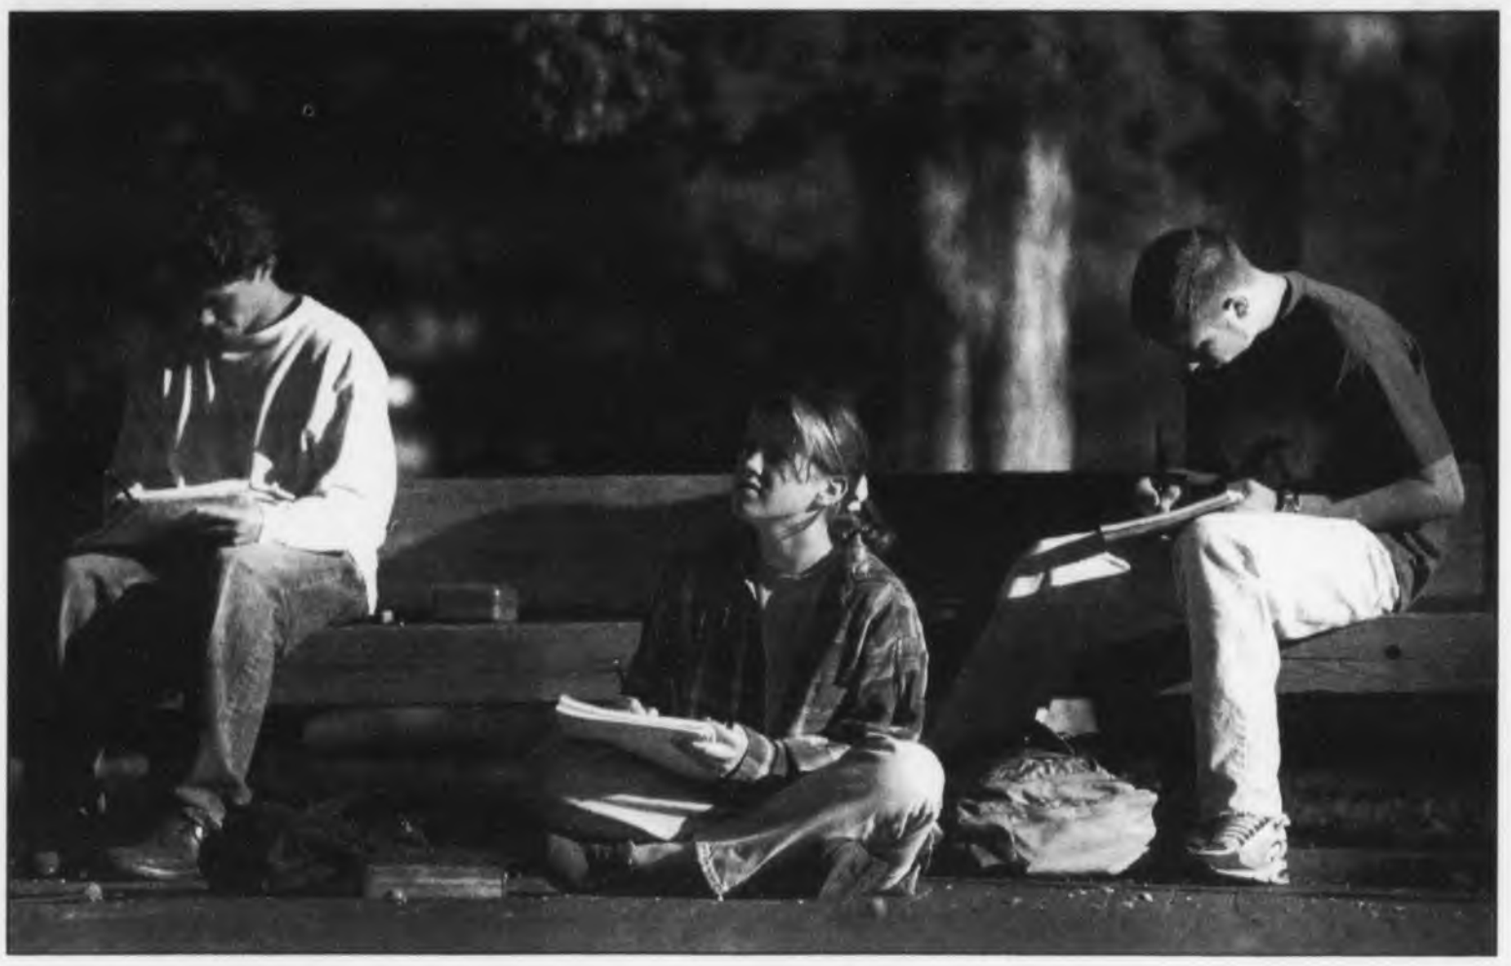
Aided by White House nuclear smuggling analyst Julia Kelly (played by Nicole Kidman), Devoe tracks the thieves to Austria, Serbia, Russia and, finally, New York, stopping only to update the cast and audience on what exactly is going on.

Kelly, a by-the-book field agent, gets dragged along by Devoe on several adventures, including a tedious car chase through the tight city streets of Vienna, where Devoe expertly converts his rented Mercedes into a lethal weapon and takes out four carloads of assassins.

Eventually, he tracks the truck carrying the warheads by — no, really — calling the Russian general on his cellular phone and scouring satellite photos for suspicious-looking vehicles. Devoe then leads a trio of helicopters to intercept the truck before it can park in Saddam Hussein's driveway.

When he proudly boasts of his rescue of eight warheads, he learns there were supposed to be nine. Whoops! The other deadly device sits in a backpack en route to New York, but in whose hands? Russian ultra-nationalists? No. Extreme Iraqi fundamentalists? No. IRA terrorists? No.

A Sarajevo piano teacher? Bingo.



But with all due respect, he's not just any piano teacher. He is the last-minute replacement of the murdered Bosnian parliament member — a man who lost his wife and daughter to sniper fire in Sarajevo. Instead of exacting his revenge on the gunman — he blames the world's politicians and wants to express as much by turning the United Nations into radioactive rubble.

If you can get past the astounding chain of events that leads to the Big Apple (not to mention Clooney's steady supply of flippant remarks), the frantic race through downtown New York almost resuscitates the film by itself.

The sequence contains a superb mix of action footage and tense stillness, including Clooney et al playing leapfrog across a sea of car hoods during gridlock while rooftop snipers strain for a clear shot that won't endanger pedestrians. And isn't it ironic that even a delusional terrorist knows it's more time-efficient to just walk rather than take a cab in New York?

Kidman is smart and tough, as usual, and, smirks notwithstanding, Clooney redeems himself as a bankable action star. However, theirs are the only two characters identifiable by name once the dozens of tiny bit parts and the convoluted storyline are stripped away.

As a pure action flick, "The Peacemaker" lives up to the DreamWorks hype and easily outdoes any of this summer's so-called blockbusters. (Yes, George, even "Batman and Robin.") However, as far as political thrillers go, let's leave those to Tom Clancy.

Doctoral student wins scholarship for work in applied statistics

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

When Christopher Bilder, doctoral student and graduate teaching assistant in statistics, returned from his summer internship he had a nice surprise waiting for him in the mail.

Bilder received notification that he was the recipient of the Ellis R. Ott Scholarship for Applied Statistics and Quality Management.

The scholarship is awarded to students who are in a graduate-level program with an applied statistics or quality management background and who have at least a 3.25 grade point average.

Bilder applied for the scholarship on the Internet and wrote a one-page essay on his career goals and activities. He received letters of recommendation from Thomas Loughin, assistant professor of statistics and Bilder's master's report supervisor; and James Higgins, professor of statistics.

Loughin said Bilder is more than just a good student.

"I always said that statistics is both an art and a science. You can teach science but not art," Loughin said.

Loughin said Bilder has a lot of creativity and an ability to look into problems. That ability is best illustrated by Bilder's master's report called "It's Good" — which shows the probability of success for making field goals of varying distances.

Loughin said Bilder would spend every Monday browsing the NFL World Wide Web page and going through the play-by-plays to determine the weather conditions, the score when the field goal was attempted and the distance of the actual attempt. Bilder studied these factors and came up with a probability.

The finished report included a poem modeled after "Casey at the Bat" and has been accepted into "Chance," a popular statistical journal, pending revisions.

Bilder will write his dissertation on bootstrapping, which is the application of the confidence interval on random samples and the assumptions made about the population from these confidence intervals.

Bilder finished his bachelor's in math at the University of Nebraska in Omaha. He didn't take a statistics course until he was a junior in college. Until that time, he wanted to be an actuary — a person who sets insurance rates.

"You don't want to tamper with that," Loughin said. "You also don't want to temper the enthusiasm by asking him to take it easy."

Chris Malone, graduate teaching assistant in statistics, started in the program at the same time Bilder did.

They both attend weekly meetings and said the graduate assistants share a lot of ideas about the approach to teaching.

"Chris is a strong asset to the statistics department," Malone said. "He is a high-quality graduate student. Somebody you want to have in your program."

Friends gather as parole date approaches for cop killer

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Words failed Matt Gamblin when his time came to speak up about why his father's killer should stay in prison. Instead, the 22-year-old buried his face in his arm and cried, an emotional response that might have spoken louder than any speech.

Donald Gamblin was run over July 13, 1991, as he stood on the shoulder of Interstate 435 writing a traffic ticket.

Officials said L. Edward Halloran had a dangerous mix of drugs in his system and was weaving in and out of traffic as he sped down the highway.

One witness who saw him said, "He's going to end up killing somebody," according to testimony at a court hearing.

The car threw Gamblin more than 200 feet, killing him instantly. Three people who were in the car that Gamblin stopped were injured when Halloran's car shoved Gamblin's motorcycle into them.

Halloran, 36, of Topeka, was on probation at the time for burglary and marijuana possession. He pleaded no contest and was later found guilty of aggravated vehicular homicide. He also was convicted of cocaine possession.

Halloran was sentenced to eight to 25 years in prison.

He's scheduled to meet with parole board members next month in his first chance at parole.

But Gamblin's widow, Ana Martens, who has remarried, led the contingent to speak against his release. She was joined by officers from four Johnson County departments, including the police chiefs of Lenexa and Shawnee.

They presented petitions with the signatures of more than 2,000 people asking that Halloran be kept in prison.

before there would be enough aluminum to build the thing," he said.

Carter also said the amount of copper wire used in the new building could produce pennies at the federal mint for at least a week.

An addition of Hale's magnitude didn't just take more materials, it also took more planning, he said.

"Back in the 1920s, they built the building from just 35 drawings. This one took 200," Carter said. "It's a hard process."

Those statistics are good to illustrate the amounts of materials that were used, but the volume of space in the new library is another impressive statistic, he said.

Facilities statistics show the building's volume to be 6,253,466 cubic feet from the fifth floor ceiling to the bottom of the basement.

That's enough space to store more than 4,100,002 13-inch color televisions.

More than 14,200 mid-sized sedans would fit in the building.

According to library figures, the new building can now seat 10 percent of the student body, up from less than 6 percent in the Farrell structure.

The library is also bigger than other metropolitan centers.

"It's larger than the new Chicago Public Library in downtown Chicago," Carter said, "and that library covers one full city block."

man.

"I just take some umbrage at the notion that what is done by jurors ... is something a computer could do better," Matsch said.

As court prepared to close for the day, Tigar said the judge unfairly lashed out at the man just because he was telling the truth.

Tigar also took issue with the judge's questioning of a woman who thought sentencing someone to life in prison without parole is a waste of taxpayers' money. Matsch asked the woman, who has a master's degree in business administration, if she was trying to apply a cost-benefit analysis' to the justice system.

The jury candidates were among four people questioned during a slow second day of jury selection. Most said they knew little about Nichols.

Selecting the 12 jurors and six alternates is expected to take more than two weeks.

In another development Tuesday, the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the procedure followed by Attorney General Janet Reno in seeking the death penalty against Nichols.

Tigar had argued that the death penalty should be thrown out because Reno announced she would seek the death penalty before Nichols' arrest robbing Nichols of a fair hearing promised by the law.

Defense attorneys say Nichols was at home in Herington, Kan., when the blast occurred and didn't know about the bombing in advance.

purchase has been bought, Carney said.

"I can fully understand why Student Publications is upset," Glendening said. "I think it's only obvious that we need to rectify what happened and make things right for Student Publications."

Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications Inc., said obtaining the final two years of funding to purchase the equipment it had intended is the goal of Student Publications Inc. He said, however, there were no indications that there was a willingness to remedy the situation and do what was right during the summer.

> Somehow, we need to bring out more confidence in the fee process. And that's going to be hard to do.
> • Ron Johnson director of Student Publications Inc.

"Through the course of this summer and certainly into this fall, very little, if any, communication between us existed in regards to this fee," Johnson said.

Glendening agreed there was a breakdown in communication between Student Senate and Student Publications Inc.

"Privilege fee has two lines of communication that they need to maintain. And unfortunately, last year both of those lines broke down with Student Publications."

Glendening said it was important for the Privilege Fee Committee to have an open dialogue to groups funded by student fees.

"We're definitely going to make a concerted effort to maintain a strong line of communication not only with Student Publications but with every privilege fee this year."

Johnson said finding out about the fee this summer frustrated people in Student Publications Inc. because of all the work that went into the original proposal.

"Somehow, we need to bring out more confidence in the fee process," he said. "And that's going to be hard to do."

Otto said the Privilege Fee Committee might write the contract into the bill approved by Senate. This possible change could help avoid future problems, he said.

"You would still have the whereas clauses and your structure the same, but once you got to 'be it resolved section one' that would basically become the agreement, so Student Senate would essentially be voting on the text of the contract," he said.

Otto said the committee would work from a dummy agreement because 80 percent of the agreements are the same.

"You change the name of the group involved, and you change some of the specifics to match what the group is, but you have a pretty standard set of agreements," he said.

Johnson said this sounded like a good idea because confusion could be avoided.

"I think that has great potential because the opportunity for error is reduced," Johnson said. "That way potential problems are seen before the final approval."

Kayaga was scheduled by the UPC Multicultural Committee.

Anna Levings, junior in public relations and chair of the UPC Multicultural Committee, said Kayaga was scheduled simply because it was cool.

Kayaga sent a video of its performance as part of its introduction packet that seemed to have really impressed the Multicultural Committee.

"The video was awesome," Levings said. "Really, that's what it was. Just the video and what they had."

Following the benefit concert, BirdHouse will resume its schedule with an Oct. 18 performance by David Roth back at the arts center.

Both concerts are at 8 p.m. with general admissions for $10 and student and seniors' tickets for $8. Advance tickets are available at The Dusty Bookshelf in Aggieville.

As far as the future goes for the BirdHouse series, its parents seem to be looking forward to it. "I think it's kind of a growing movement," Holden said. "There's no reason this shouldn't keep going."

Kamerer also said that his goal is to stay with the series for the long haul. "There hasn't been one concert that I haven't loved," Kamerer said.

Martini added that he believes people just need to try the series to be hooked. "We hope people just come out and take in a show," Martini said.

However, school officials said they can't remove a tenured professor for expressing his opinion.

MIT administrators said Monday they are planning an alcohol education campaign and are considering banning alcohol campuswide.

"The MIT community will do all that we can to see that this kind of tragedy never happens here again," MIT President Charles Vest said.

The fraternity was immediately suspended from taking part in social activities at the university.

In August, a student died at a fraternity at Louisiana State University after a night of drinking. It was the latest in several deaths linked to alcohol at fraternities in the past year, including incidents in California, Maryland and New York.

REC REPORT

This is a Paid Advertisement

Tune in to our full page ad on the 1st day of each month for program information and monthly calendar of Recreational Services Events!

WHO'S WHO AT THE REC

Will Kennedy, senior in construction science, has been employed with the Department of Recreational Services since the fall of 1992. "There are just a few of us who have been here this long," he said. Starting out as an official, he now holds a position as an intramural supervisor. Soccer is his specialty and he has enjoyed watching the participant numbers rise over the years. "I've watched the soccer team numbers grow from about 30 to 50 teams," Will said. Along with the addition of equipment and space, he said he has also seen the development of new intramural sports such as sand volleyball. Most of all, Will said he enjoys the people at the Rec Complex-both the participants and the employees.

Amy Shay, senior in elementary education and health, holds two positions with the Department of Recreational Services. She is a student office assistant and an aerobics instructor. Amy has worked two years for the department, but has been working out at the Rec Complex since she was a freshman. "We're so lucky to have such a great facility," she said. "I see working out as both a hobby and a way to relieve stress." After graduation from K-State, Amy plans to move to Austin, TX and begin her teaching career while working toward a masters degree. She also plans to stay certified as an aerobics instructor. "I like to see people involved and staying in shape," she said, "and I enjoy providing them a way to do that ."

Working It Out.

What would you do if you knew of an activity that would bolster your self-esteem, help you sleep better, give you more energy, control your weight, help you cope with stress and give you a chance to meet other people? These are just some of the benefits of aerobic exercise. Make Wildcat Workouts part of your regular schedule and start enjoying these benefits!

A special beginner's instructional class for Basic Step Aerobics is scheduled for Tues., Oct. 7 at 5:30 p.m.

The Body Trec is exciting, fun and challenging for exercisers of all fitness levels!

My Favorite Workout

Brianne Dusin, freshman in nutrition and exercise science, makes the Rec Complex part of her afternoon activity at least five days a week. Prior to the first day of classes, she officially began her quest to keep off the freshmen fifteen. She follows her own weightlifting and cardiovascular workout routine, but has recently ventured into the world of aerobics. "This kind of aerobics is new to me, so it's fun to go with friends," she said. "That way when we don't know the moves, we can goof up together." Brianne currently participates in intramural flag football and is excited to take on more team sports like volleyball and basketball. "I'm excited about all of the opportunities they provide here," she said. She plans to continue her involvement and stay in shape.

Nutrition NOTES

What is a balanced eating plan to fuel up for fitness? The best eating plan for exercisers does not differ much from a regular, balanced diet. It should include adequate fluids and plenty of low-fat, high carbohydrate foods that provide energy and replenish the fuel and fluids used during physical activity. Exercisers should pay careful attention to their nutrition needs before, during and after exercise. (American Dietetics Association)

Task force recommends $300,000 in academic-journal cuts

SHEYENE FOSTER
staff writer

Short- and long-term recommendations regarding the cutting of funding for periodicals at Farrell Library were finalized Wednesday by the university's Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the 21st Century.

Hale Library

The task force, which first met in May, has been working on solutions to the growing problem of soaring journal prices and limited library funds.

Nelda Elder, chair of collections management at the library, said finding solutions to these problems can be difficult.

"The solution is so big," Elder said. "It's a problem of the system of scholarly publications and its infrastructure, which has caused the business of scholarly journals to develop. This demand has caused inflation."

As a short-term solution, the task force has proposed a total of $300,000 in universitywide journal cuts. These cuts will be distributed among the departments on a sliding scale of 5 to 20 percent based on three criteria. The criteria are rate of serial inflation, proportion of overall serial budget and the average cost per periodical subscription.

To replace these cuts in journals, the library would implement a program known as UNCOVER, beginning this January. UNCOVER would provide access to about 17,000 journals, nearly three times the number of journals available on the shelves, Cynthia McCahon, the chair of the task force, said.

"The UNCOVER database is a good idea because we'll be able to order only the articles that we need," McCahon said.

"The whole key to really getting this problem solved is to switch from print subscriptions to electronic. It's just a more cost-effective way of doing things."

McCahon said the process would be relatively easy for faculty and students to use.

"Delivery would be in 24 to 48 hours and there would be an access fee of $16 per article plus copyright fees," McCahon said. "But that will be paid for by the library out of an electronic retrieval fund."

McCahon said there would be no limits to the number of articles a person could access, except for a possible cap on copyright fees.

"We're thinking of putting a cap on the retrieval cost of $25 per article with copyright cost, but there will not be a cap on the number of articles a person can access."

The task force also suggested a number of possibilities for long-term funding strategies.

Possible resources include increased funding allocations by the state Legislature, a higher proportion of department overhead and external research grant monies being funneled into the library, and fund raising with the KSU Foundation. Other options include taking a percentage of certain revenues from athletic activities, a new student privilege fee of $2 per credit hour or signing a contract with Coke or Pepsi.

McCahon said efficient use of resources will also be necessary in the future. Implementing an annual dialogue with all departments and their library representatives to discuss cuts and needs will be extremely important.

Additionally, data will be collected on the use of serials, monographs and other electronic resources to determine which ways of accessing certain journals will be the most cost-effective.

McCahon said in the long term, it will take all of these components to finance the library and the ever-increasing inflation in journals.

"Over the summer, we analyzed what the potential funding was for each of these sources," McCahon said. "We fully intend for it (funding) to be a mix. It will not be from just one source, but from a multitude of sources, so that everyone is contributing."

Stovall helps Crisis Center announce new hotline

MARY RENEE SMITH
staff writer

Kansas Attorney General Carla Stovall rolled up her sleeves to fight domestic violence and sexual abuse during a visit to Manhattan on Wednesday. Stovall dipped her hand in blue paint and left her print on the Hands Against Violence Wall, one of the events for Resist Violence Month.

Bill Graves has issued a proclamation declaring October Resist Violence Month.

Stovall kicked off the month by announcing the new Kansas Crisis Hotline number, (888) END-ABUSE or (888) 363-2287. The statewide toll-free number is made possible by a grant to the Crisis Center of Manhattan. The money is federal funding distributed by the attorney general's office.

The new Kansas Crisis Hotline number was announced as part of Resist Violence Month. The toll free number is (888) END-ABUSE.

Stovall said there are more than 27 programs for domestic violence and sexual assault statewide, but the Crisis Center and its satellite programs are really some of the most active.

"The Crisis Center staff and volunteers do a wonderful job, and frankly, if their efforts were replicated in communities all across the state, the picture would be very different in terms of the way victims are treated and the amount of abuse that happens," Stovall said.

Julie Lee, president of the Crisis Center board of directors, said writing the grant was an intense process and the kick-off sees the work finally come to the public. Lee said this is a special program for the center to take on.

The Crisis Center has worked with victims of abuse in Manhattan for a number of years but now will be answering calls on a statewide level.

"It is branching out for us, certainly not in a way we don't feel qualified to do," Lee said. "I think it is a very natural extension of what we do."

Stovall said she hopes the campaign will raise awareness of domestic violence.

"We kind of like to think things like this don't happen in our state or that child abuse doesn't happen in our state, but unfortunately it does," Stovall said. "We need to recognize that."

The Hands Against Violence Wall will be at the Manhattan Town Center and available for community members to leave their hand prints as a show of support against violence. The Domestic Violence Task Force designed T-shirts they are urging community members to wear on Fridays to show support for the Resist Violence campaign.

"THIS IS A MONSTROUS BUILDING. JUST DEALING WITH THE DISCARDS OF THE OLD FURNITURE IS A NIGHTMARE. WE HAD TO BE EXTREMELY CREATIVE."

FURNISHING FARRELL

Library faculty makes due with used furniture, uses funds elsewhere

STORY BY RUSSELL FORTMEYER • PHOTO BY JEFF COOPER

Farrell Library, to be dedicated as Hale on Sunday, has slowly been filling up with club chairs, couches, easy chairs and wooden seats so much that students are beginning to take notice.

On any given day, nearly every couch and club chair on the second floor is occupied by students with noses buried in books.

Wooden chairs, built especially to resemble the original 1927 wood chairs in the third-floor main reading room, have piled up along Farrell's main corridors.

On Tuesday, table tops near social sciences lay on the floor awaiting legs.

However, behind the downy cushion of new furniture, library departments are making do with old furniture.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, bought his own office furniture outfitting his fifth floor office overlooking the campus with wing backs and an assortment of desks.

"Our first priority was to do the building," Hobrock said. "Furniture was secondary."

Hobrock said there is no money in sight for improving the office situation.

He said competing issues, like the recent outcry about the cut in the number of journal subscriptions, have shifted funding priorities.

"This is a monstrous building," he said. "Just dealing with the discards of the old furniture is a nightmare. We had to be extremely creative."

Early in the development process of the library, the administration made the decision to shift funds from the movable equipment, or furniture, budget to the base building budget.

By doing this, they reasoned, the university could get more of a building in the long run, while getting by with less furniture in the short run.

The administration has entered into what is called "certificate of participation" financing, which is run by the state. It's a low-interest loan the university is using to purchase some of the basic furniture, like the couches and tables, for the public areas of the library.

"We've done as much as we think we can do at this point," said Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance. "Those were hard decisions. We made conscious decisions to take this path."

Rawson said the university is working to find revenue streams with which to repay the loans.

By no means is the library staff going without furniture.

Daniel Liestman, chair of the social sciences and humanities department, said the library is looking to improve the working environment for employees by refurnishing offices with new desks, computer tables and credenzas.

"That's something we're continuing to work toward," Liestman said.

"It's looking to improve the level of quality of furniture and an effort to improve the working environment," he said.

Students have responded to the new furniture positively.

Bray Hanson, junior in early childhood education, said she likes to stop in between classes to get some reading done.

"I like it," Hanson said. "It's more comfortable. You're not sitting on the hard chairs, but the books are still really confusing to me."

Hanson was sitting back on a love seat on the first floor reading a book under the stairs.

Above her on the second floor, Andy Armbruster, sophomore in agricultural education, sat on a couch looking over his planner.

"I like it quite a bit," Armbruster, a member of the FarmHouse fraternity, said. "It's a place where I can relax."

Committee works to solve local traffic problems, ensure safety of students

The City/University Tax Fund has a budget of $550,000, but only $400,000 can be used because $150,000 pays the city if there is a fire on campus.

ZACH VADER
staff reporter

The city of Manhattan and some concerned students are working together to make K-State and the city a better place to live.

In a joint venture with the city, the Governmental Relations Committee is involved with making improvements that could benefit K-State as well as Manhattan.

The committee is responsible for coming up with projects for the City/University Tax Fund. The fund was created when the city annexed K-State in 1994, and is funded by a 1-percent sales tax on anything purchased on campus.

Mandy Reese, vice chair of the Governmental Relations Committee, said the committee gets its ideas for projects, or what it calls a "wish list," by talking to students and observing what needs to be done around campus.

"We have a lot of goals for this committee," she said. "But our two main concerns are traffic problems around campus and the safety of the students."

Patrick Carney, chair of the committee, said traffic lights at Thurston Street and North Manhattan Avenue and Jardine Drive and Denison Avenue are a concern.

"There is a lot of pedestrian traffic and no regulated traffic system in those two areas," Carney said. "We feel these projects are a necessity."

Reese said past projects have been successful over the years and she hopes it will continue.

"Some of the more major projects have been great," she said. "We helped out the student escort service with equipment, university infrastructure and a computer system between Farrell and the public library."

Reese also said she hoped the fund will be used for bicycle paths around campus and the city, as well as more lights around the campus in general.

The biggest accomplishment of the fund, Reese said, is the placement of cameras and more lighting on campus and along highly traveled routes of students.

"We have spent $50,000 on this over the years, which gives us about 10 times the lighting and cameras we used to have," she said.

Carney said the primary projects the money goes to are for beautification and safety, but safety is a priority.

"I would rather have a good traffic system at an intersection than a fountain," Carney said. "The issue of safety is always a precedence over beautification."

Reese said proposals such as these go on the committee's wish list and go to the Judge to lighten community service sentences for organ donations

JOHNSON CITY, Tenn. – How much is a kidney or lung worth? Twelve days in Judge David Brand's court.

Brand wants more people to sign organ donor cards, and he's offering this deal: Those placed on probation for misdemeanors can get up to 12 days knocked off their community service if they sign an organ donor card.

"It's such a waste to bury those organs in the ground," Brand said Wednesday from his office in Rogersville. He plans to begin offering the deal to defendants in his General Sessions Court later this month.

Brand, who has a friend awaiting a kidney transplant, said he's not forcing anyone to give up organs and noted the defendants can always revoke their donor cards later.

"It's no skin off them," he said. "It's not like I'm saying I want their kidney now."

Under state guidelines, people convicted of misdemeanors must perform two days of community service for each month of probation.

With more than 53,000 people awaiting organ transplants nationwide, Lee McCartt, executive director of Life Resources Regional Donor Center in Johnson City, said anything that encourages donations is good.

Vaccine cuts deadly disease in young children by 95 percent

ATLANTA, Geor. – Bacterial meningitis, once one of the most feared and dangerous childhood diseases, has been dramatically reduced in children by a vaccine that came into widespread use in 1990, a study found.

The study by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention said that as a result, bacterial meningitis now mostly strikes adults, rather than infants and toddlers.

Bacterial meningitis is a brain infection that can quickly cause death, mental retardation, blindness or deafness.

Haemophilus influenzae type b, or Hib, was once the leading cause of meningitis among children youner than 5. It is spread by sneezing and coughing.

Before the Hib vaccine, there were 40 to 60 cases of Hib per 100,000 children younger than 5 each year and as many as 10,000 developed bacterial meningitis, according to the CDC.

However, the Hib vaccine, which has been given routinely to 2-month-old babies since 1990, cut meningitis cases among children younger than 5 by 87 percent from 1986 to 1995, the study found. That contributed to a 55-percent decline in meningitis cases for all age groups.

Couple request $60,000 tip back, police refuse to release money

VANCOUVER, Wash. – The nice couple left a $30 tip. The bag full of cash – well, they want that back.

A bartender at Tony Roma's, a chain restaurant near Vancouver Mall, was tidying up after the man and woman had left when she found a leather case containing $60,000.

"I pulled out a big, huge wad of money," said the woman, who asked that her name not be used. "The whole bag was full of money. It was 100s, 50s and 20s."

Her first thought was of drug dealers.

"I had a bad feeling," she said. "I got nervous and asked the hostess to make sure the front door was locked. I grabbed the bag and went in the back and asked the manager to call the police."

Someone else called police as well: a lawyer who said his clients had left the money behind. He wouldn't identify his clients and police won't consider releasing the money unless he does, Lt. Janet Thiessen said Tuesday.

"Until we find out exactly who they are, the money will stay in our evidence room," she said.

Body identified as missing woman

HALSTEAD, Kan. – The body of a woman found in this south-central Kansas town was identified as 39-year-old Susan Pogue.

Pogue had been missing for more than two weeks, when her body was found Friday behind some trees near her home. Pogue's teen-age daughter, who was living with her father after her mother disappeared, found the body while looking for a cat at her mother's home.

Pogue was positively identified Sunday. She had been dead about two weeks, said David Egley, deputy police chief.

The cause of death is unknown. No signs of trauma or foul play were found on the body, but police are investigating the death as suspicious.

Snead balances mayor of Manhattan with family, work, community responsibilities

BRUCE SNEAD, mayor of Manhattan, was elected on April 15, and has been a city commissioner since April 1995.

Collegian

TONYA ALLOWAY
staff reporter

If Bruce Snead weren't the mayor of Manhattan, he might be found body boarding on a beach in California.

Instead, he is surfing the community of Manhattan, fulfilling his duties as mayor, city commissioner, energy specialist for the College of Engineering, husband and father.

"I'm trying to meet my real job and my moonlight-job obligations," Snead said. "I'm trying to balance family, work and community."

Snead was elected mayor on April 15, and has been a city commissioner since April 1995.

"It's fun being mayor because you get to meet and greet a lot of different people you probably would never hook up with," Snead said. He said it is amazing to see all the different groups of people who make up the community. "It's an honor and a privilege to be their mayor."

Snead has lived all over the United States. He was born in Chicago, and his family moved to California when he was 9 years old. In California, he received a bachelor's degree in architecture. He also studied in Italy for one year.

In 1974, he moved to Ithaca, N.Y., where he and his wife Leslie studied as graduate students at Cornell University for two years. Snead studied environmental analysis.

Snead moved to Manhattan in 1976 and taught for the K-State College of Architecture, Planning, and Design for one year. Then he and a partner started the Great Plains Shelter Co., which designed and constructed energy-efficient solar homes and additions. The company lasted three years, until Snead's partner decided to return to school.

Snead returned to teach for the College of Architecture Planning and Design. In 1982, he became the residential energy specialist for the College of Engineering. He said this job carried a lot of responsibility.

Because Snead and other instructors in the College of Engineering aren't tenured professors yet, they are responsible for finding grants and contracts to pay their own salary and staff that work under them.

"I do lots of work with indoor quality training and radon measurement and training," he said.

Many of the grants are in the area of energy and building efficiency.

Outside of his responsibilities as mayor, Snead is also involved in the community. He was one of the founding members of Sustainable Manhattan Project, a new community-based idea to preserve the social, economic and environmental aspects of the community for future generations.

"It's important to be connected with the natural world," Snead said. He said people have a responsibility to the natural resources and it is necessary to get outside and appreciate the quality and importance of nature.

"You have to meet your obligations," Snead said. "I'd characterize myself as a strong supporter of the environment and responsible policies that recognize the essential long-term responsibilities to the environment."

In his free time, Snead likes to play basketball and golf. He and his 15-year-old son, Braden, are refurbishing a '52 Chevy pickup. He said he also likes to barbecue and cook the family's Sunday morning waffles.

Snead said the community of Manhattan is a great place to raise a family.

"Having lived in various places, I really like the scale of this community and the ability to participate and be involved," he said.

Snead said he doesn't look too far to the future as far as personal goals go. "I have enough on my platter. I try to make the right decisions for the whole community," he said. "If you do that, everything else will fall into place."

Distraught Mississippi student kills mother, girlfriend, wounds 6 classmates in rampage

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PEARL, Miss. — A teen-ager stabbed his mother to death, then went to school Wednesday with a rifle under his trench coat and opened fire, killing his former girlfriend and another student and wounding six others, police said.

Woodham

Luke Woodham, 16, was distraught over a breakup with his girlfriend, Police Chief Bill Slade said, choking back tears as he talked about the rampage in this town of 22,000 people just outside Jackson.

"He gave us a statement, and his manifesto was that he felt he had been wronged," the chief said.

Woodham was arrested as he drove away in his dead mother's car and was charged with murder and aggravated assault.

The shootings at Pearl High School began about 8:10 a.m. as buses arrived.

An expressionless Woodham, a sophomore, entered the large commons area just inside the front door of the imposing school and immediately walked up to his former girlfriend, witnesses said. Police said she was the first to fall, followed by three young men and four young women apparently shot at random.

"He was shooting anybody he could find. He shot at me and hit the staircase," said Mark Wilkerson, a freshman. "I saw fragments going everywhere."

Students ran screaming into classrooms and dived for cover.

"People were laying everywhere bleeding," said freshman Nathan Henry. "I didn't hear cries. Everybody looked dead."

Casey King, a ninth-grader, said Woodham talked to at least one of the wounded. "He apologized, said he was sorry and was not shooting anybody in particular," King said.

Police later found the body of Mary T. Woodham, 50, at her home, about a mile from the school.

The slain students were identified as Lydia Kaye Dew, 17, and Christina Menefee, 16. It was unclear which girl had dated Woodham.

Three of the wounded students were hospitalized. One, an 18-year-old, was in serious condition.

Slade said Mary Woodham, a receptionist was believed to have died about three hours before the shootings. Neighbors said the teen-ager's mother usually took him to school, but on Wednesday he got into the car by himself, hitting a tree and crossing a neighbor's yard as he drove away.

In his yearbook photo, a serious-looking Woodham has shoulder-length brown hair and wire-rimmed glasses.

"He always seemed polite, like a nice guy," said Courtni Thomas, a senior. "It doesn't seem real that anyone like him would do this."

The school has no armed guards or weapons searches.

"We had no idea that anything like this would ever take place at any of our schools," said school board attorney Arthur Jernigan Jr.

Classes were canceled until Monday, but students were told to report on Friday for counseling.

Weeping students gathered in small groups outside the school, where the flag was lowered to half-staff. Others held hands and prayed.

"He keeps hearing the shots go through his head," Robin Rhodes said of her son, 16-year-old Michael, who was in the commons at the time of the shooting. "I thought my kids were safe here."

Mercy Health Center kicks off fall with craft fair

ANGELA BUCCIGROSSI
staff reporter

Every October the weather gets cooler, the trees begin to turn red and yellow, and for 24 years, the Mercy Health Center Auxiliary has been helping usher in the fall season with the annual Pumpkin Patch Arts and Crafts Fair.

This year the fair will take place from 10 a.m. to 8 p.m. on Friday and 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Saturday in CiCo Park at the fair grounds. The fair will also be open from 9 a.m. to 10 a.m. on both days for an hour of shopping for disabled and senior visitors.

Sponsored by the volunteer auxiliary, the event helps raise money for special requests from the hospital.

This year, visitors can look at the booths of 140 exhibitors from five different states, Sandy Messelt, Pumpkin Patch lease chairwoman, said.

Exhibitors will be selling a variety of crafts, including jewelry, clothing, small and large wood items, ceramics, pottery, stoneware and dolls.

"You will find lots of seasonal items and lots of florals," Messelt said.

Messelt said the number of exhibitors selling K-State arts and crafts has grown from last year.

"There are lots of K-State items. If you want it, we've got it. It's amazing that most all of the exhibitors have incorporated K-State into their booths," she said.

The number of visitors who attend the fair is greatly affected by K-State. In past years, visitors attended the fair before going to K-State football games, but because of the increase in tailgating, fans now have little time before the game. The auxiliary has now begun planning the event around game weekends, Messelt said.

"We don't have a football game this weekend, so we expect lots of people to attend," she said.

Along with arts and crafts, visitors can also enjoy a variety of food prepared by the hospital and the auxiliary. The menu includes steak, ham and turkey sandwiches, sloppy joes, doughnuts, homemade pies and more.

Amy Bartel, Manhattan resident and senior in architectural engineering, visits the fair every year because of the variety of artisans and crafters who exhibit.

"It's a great place to get Christmas gifts and lots of good ideas. It seems that each year gets bigger and bigger," Bartel said.

Senate should weigh the consequences of a plus system

Student Senate will be voting on an issue Thursday that could potentially affect every student at K-State, now and in the future.

Senators will decide if they support or don't support a plus-grading system for K-State. If approved, it would still need to be voted on by Faculty Senate.

The plus system would change the traditional grading system currently used by the university. For instance, if a student gets an 89 percent in a class in which a 90 percent is an A, the plus system would allow an instructor to give the student a B plus, adding 0.3 to their grade point.

This might sound like a great idea, but for every positive point there is a negative.

The plus system would allow instructors to reward a student who puts forth extra effort but falls just short of the next highest letter grade.

However, instructors can do anything they want to do with their grading scales. Instructors can decide if a 90 percent is an A. They can make a 95 percent or a 70 percent an A if they so desire.

An instructor teaching one section of a class might use the plus system. An instructor teaching another section of the same class might decide not to use it.

Instituting a plus-grading system doesn't ensure instructors will use it.

A plus-grading system could also make K-State graduates more competitive in the job market, but it could have the reverse effect as well.

A potential employer might look at an adjusted GPA and hire a K-State graduate because they have a higher GPA than a KU graduate. Potential employers might also be confused by how much a GPA is inflated by the plus system.

Students, this legislation could directly affect your lives and future. Let your voice be heard.

Respond to the eCollegian poll today and let us know how you feel about the implementation of a plus system. The results will be given to the Senate leadership.

Let your representatives know how you feel.

They're your grades.

Make the right choices & choose responsibility

"YALE FIVE" EXEMPLIFY OUR UNWILLINGNESS TO ACCEPT RESPONSIBILITY FOR OUR ACTIONS

VIEWPOINT

Have you heard about this?

A group of five Yale students are considering a suit against the university on the grounds of religious discrimination. What did the Yale faculty do to offend these students' religious sensibilities, you ask? They're making them live in residence halls.

One of the students — who shall remain nameless, not to protect him, but because I don't want to be even a small cog in his media machine — wrote an opinion piece for The New York Times in which he explained the students' position.

In a nutshell, Yale wants them to live in the residence halls. The Yale residence halls are dens of wickedness (the author of the Times piece can be heard weeping and gnashing his teeth as he describes some of the safe sex literature he discovered posted on the walls of his residence hall).

Therefore, the students want to be allowed to move out of the residence halls where their way of life is being impinged upon (all five are orthodox Jews, but they could just as easily be Baptists or Muslims). If they don't get to move out, they will be forced to sue the school for religious discrimination.

They may as well sue the world. I assure you, it falls far short of the teachings of the Torah (or the Koran or the New Testament).

When it gets right down to it, the fact that the world is not an ideal place to live in is beside the point. What this all boils down to, as do many unscrupulous or misguided lawsuits, is choice.

Every single member of the self-titled "Yale Five" chose to attend that university, knowing that they would have to live in the residence hall. The brother of the writer of the Times piece recently graduated from Yale, so he knew that it was, as Newsweek put it, "no Yeshiva."

Every Fiver could have attended any number of colleges, as evidenced by the fact that they were accepted into Yale in the first place.

Not one of them is being forced to do anything, especially sue a respected university, because they can't avert their eyes from the things that bother them. In fact, no one forced them into reading the safe sex literature in the first place.

And yet they're probably feeling pretty righteous right now, as if they were making a stand for their religion. It seems that a more sublime statement might have been to attend another university.

"But then it wouldn't be Yale," you say. They wouldn't learn that crisp, clipped Ivy League accent. They wouldn't get to use the vast facilities of the university.

Tough.

When it comes to your principles, people, you should stand behind them fully — or they don't really exist. Is it really enough for these students who are so offended by this school's attempt to educate the sexually ignorant to simply move off campus? Do you think it would really have been enough for Lot to have moved to the suburbs of Gomorrah?

If you want to learn about principles (and fine screen writing), rent the 1966 movie "A Man For All Seasons." The true story of Sir Thomas More, who, with as little as a sentence, could have saved his life. But he stuck to his principles both fervently and eloquently and was beheaded for it. There's a guy who would probably have chosen Manhattan Christian College over Yale if he thought the latter would taint his entire way of life.

This one case probably wouldn't irk me so much, either, if it didn't typify the way that some people in our culture are losing the ability to think for themselves and take responsibility for their actions. Other examples: the lady who sued McDonald's when she spilled coffee on herself, the new T.V. ratings system, people suing tobacco companies for giving them cancer when in actuality they sought cancer out, etc.

Then it all comes around and bites us in the butt. Cigarettes are going to cost more for those who want to smoke, someday you're probably going to have to sign a waiver in order to get served a meal, and according to new Collegian guidelines, I am discouraged from using the words mailman, black sheep and queer because we wouldn't want to offend, now would we?

It's simple. We live in a country that's supposed to protect your right to choose your own way of life. If a T.V. show offends you, turn it off. If a place offends you, leave. If I offend you, quit reading.

EVOLUTION

COMPUTERS ARE EMERGING WITH NEW TECHNOLOGY

Computers, computers, computers — that's what today's technology has come down to. Wherever you go — whether on a street, in a car or even to your classes — you are likely to interact with them. You will most likely be either using them or using some equipment built by computers.

According to CNN, the number of computer owners in the United States has more than tripled since 1982. Nearly 42 percent of Americans now own a personal computer, and another 28 percent are likely to purchase a computer in the next five years.

This tells us how many people are depending on these worthy machines. So what does this computer look like from the inside?

I am not going to try giving a lecture on computers. Rather, I would like to inform you of some basic information on the microprocessor, which users should know before they sit in front of their computer screens.

The architecture of this state-of-the-art machine consists of the central processing unit (CPU), the input/output unit (I/O) and the main memory. The CPU has an arithmetic logic unit and a control unit. All of these components perform elementary operations of arithmetic.

The arithmetic logic unit (ALU) performs the arithmetic and logical operations on the data sent. This arithmetic is as simple as one plus one. The ironic thing about these operations is that although they are simple, they add up to perform the most complicated operations imaginable, certainly with a margin of error. After all, computers can make mistakes.

VIEWPOINT

MAJED KHAN

MAJED KHAN is a graduate student in electrical engineering. You can send e-mail to Majed at majed@ksu.edu.

The control units actually cause things to happen. They cause information to be exchanged between memory and the I/O components. They also control data exchange, allowing the ALU to perform specific functions.

The I/O unit controls the flow of data of the CPU. It may also control an external device such as printers. The main memory component stores permanent and temporary data.

This layout of the CPU and other components is as simple as it gets.

These components are built to fractions of a hair width. Don't ask me how they built these — it's another topic.

Conventional semiconductor memory chips store the ones and zeros of digital computer code as tiny electrical charges. The chip's circuitry determines only whether a charge is present or absent. Today, computer chips are made of silicon, an element found in sand. Various processes have to take place to enable this derivative of sand to perform these operations.

The value of these operations boil down to one factor — speed. This consideration is so critical to the computer industry that industries have spent billions of dollars to meet demands.

If you are not familiar with the recent breakthrough of IBM's copper-based, superfast computer chips, then hear this: The first of IBM's new copper chips will appear in its high-end computers. In addition to mainframe computer chips, the new process will also be used to make PowerPC chips, which are used in IBM's RS/6000 and AS/400 computer lines.

These new chips will run at speeds as fast as one gigahertz, compared to the fastest microprocessors found in today's personal computers, which run at 300 megahertz. Not to mention the researchers in upstate New York recently created a splash in the computer world with just a few drops of genetic solution.

The scientists, working at the University of Rochester, took the drops of DNA, the double-helix coding for genes, and mixed them in a test tube to create a type of rudimentary computer that they hope could one day mature into one of the most powerful computers — at least in terms of processing speeds.

Instead of using electrical impulses — a technique used in all digital computers — to control the commands a processor gives to a computer, nucleotides, the basic units of DNA, were used to replicate the actions of a processor. But don't expect to own a bubbling test-tube computer to run your spread sheets and word-processing applications.

Researchers looking into the potential of molecular computation agree that even a pre-Pentium computer would easily outperform a DNA computer trying to perform simple tasks now done on PCs.

The world's most powerful supercomputer now sprawls across nearly 150 square meters at the U.S. government's Sandia National Laboratories in New Mexico. But a DNA computer has the potential to perform the same breakneck-speed computations in a single drop of water.

The merit exists in the fact that DNA molecules are so small that potentially one liter of DNA solution can store 10 to the 21st power bits of information, which is gigantic. The maximum memory of digital computers is approximately 10 to the 15th power. Obviously, a computer with that kind of memory is a supercomputer.

Certainly, this is one avenue the computer industry could take by the time we get to the year 2050. Then we'll have computers that are very different from what we have now in the silicon-based chip. For me, it also goes beyond computation and enters the area where we can study the relationship between computer technology, computer science, mathematics, biology and biotechnology.

Computers not solution to every campus problem

Editor,

I am writing in regard to Boyd Ferris' column in Tuesday's Collegian, "Lines from Hell." He suggested the use of the university's World Wide Web site as a means of all updates on enrollment, IDs and obtaining information concerning football tickets. Ferris also suggested the university post class schedules, financial aid and transcript information also, which is very unethical.

Why must students always think computers are the solution to K-State's long lines? Yes, computers are becoming more and more efficient in this day and age. However, they aren't as reliable as one may think. Computers lock up, which results in the loss of valuable information. Computer systems fail and records can be stored incorrectly.

K-State's web page can be used to update students on valuable information. However, using it to post transcripts, class schedules and financial aid is not a good idea at all. That information would be too easy for anyone to access, with or without a PIN number. This is my personal information, and I do not want to share it with the world.

If students try a little more patience and understanding, the problem would not be as bad as students make it seem. There is no need for the administration to change the way they conduct business dealing with financial aid, transcripts or class schedules. Students need to tough it out, beat the crowds and everything will be all right in the end.

the BIG 12 rundown

TEXAS

SATURDAY
at Oklahoma State
11:30 a.m.
The Longhorns will hand the Cowboys their first loss.

Both crews have swift backs and can gain large portions of real estate in the running game. OSU has ample momentum from five consecutive wins, dating back to a 38-17 verdict over Baylor in Stillwater to conclude 1996.

Texas seeks to maintain ball control after utilizing this aspect last week in a 38-31 victory over Rice in Houston.

MISSOURI

SATURDAY
vs. Iowa State
1 p.m.
The Tigers will dominate this game over an outmanned Cyclones team.

Iowa State again demonstrated its ability to amass quick points in 52-29 and 63-20 losses to Minnesota and Iowa, respectively, from the Big Ten in its last two games before an off-date last week.

The Tigers also ran into a Big Ten juggernaut in Ohio State last week, but feature one of the nation's top running attacks. Last year's 76-point display included 696 rushing yards between the two schools.

OKLAHOMA

SATURDAY at Kansas
1 p.m.
Oklahoma, which is finally starting to play near its talent level, should dispatch Kansas with ease.

After opening the season on the earliest date in school or Big 12 history on Aug. 23 in the NACDA Pigskin classic, the Sooners have had plenty of time to iron out the kinks of youth.

Kansas has the advantage of an open week following a 34-7 loss at Cincinnati and seeks to infuse new life into its running game.

OU tries to avoid having to make a fourth quarter surge to pull out a triumph.

TEXAS A&M

SATURDAY at Colorado
2:30 p.m.
The Aggies will suprise folks and shut down the Buffaloes.

Texas A&M has its toughest test to date after allowing just 16 points to its first three opponents — Sam Houston State, Southwestern Louisiana and North Texas. The Aggies represent Colorado's fourth successive opponent which has at least received votes in one or more Top 25 polls in 1997 national surveys. A&M utilizes a punishing running attack in '97, while the Buffaloes look to throw.

TEXAS TECH

SATURDAY at Baylor
6 p.m.
The Bears will win this battle for the last in the Big 12 South.

Both squads have met Top 10 opposition (Baylor at Michigan; Texas Tech at Tennessee) and should be ready for the challenges of Big 12 contests.

The Red Raiders exploded for 86 points in their last two games while the Bears rallied for a 37-35 verdict at Fresno State.

Having an open date may also help heal up some wounds for the Red Raiders and Bears.

"I think we just need to keep stepping it up every game and I'll be happy."

Cats break Big 12 Conference losing streak

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

The K-State volleyball team took a little while getting started in Big 12 Conference volleyball play.

The Wildcats dropped matches to Colorado and Nebraska last weekend to open the season 0-2.

However, when it came time for the Sunflower State showdown against Kansas on Wednesday night, the Cats didn't waste any time disposing of the Jayhawks for win No. 1.

K-State jumped out to a 9-2 lead in game one and cruised from there, taking the match 3-0.

"We just came here ready to play," senior setter Devon Ryning said. "I think we were ready to play the last two games, but we played well tonight. Things in our offense definitely started to click, and we're doing better."

With their play, the Cats seemed to tease the Hawks — baiting them into a competitive match before pulling out the clutch points to stomp their hopes.

After K-State took the 9-2 lead in game one, the Jayhawks went on a 10-4 match to make things interesting. But the Cats scored two quick points to win the opener 15-12.

In game two, the Cats fell behind 4-0, giving the Hawks hopes of climbing back into the match. But they put together an 11-0 run to take a commanding lead. Kansas closed the gap to 14-10, but never got any closer as the Cats took a 15-10 victory.

During the break after game two, K-State coach Jim McLaughlin wanted to make sure his team didn't let its guard down after taking the 2-0 lead.

"Before the last game, I told them this would be the toughest game. I wanted them to upgrade and keep getting better throughout the match," he said.

Well, McLaughlin was half right.

The Cats definitely upgraded and played better.

But it sure wasn't the toughest game of the match.

K-State went on a little run, 15 points to be exact, to start and finish the game. With the 15-0 victory, the Cats recorded their second shutout game of the season.

During game three, K-State put up monster numbers in its smashing of Kansas. The Cats had no attack errors and an attack percentage of .667, while Kansas had six attack errors and an attack percentage of -.053.

"I think we just need to keep stepping it up every game and I'll be happy," Ryning, the team captain, said.

With the win, K-State is now 1-2 in conference play, 9-5 overall. Kansas fell to 7-9, 0-3. It was the fifth consecutive match the Cats have taken from the Hawks.

Even though the Cats entered the game winless and riding a four-match winning streak against the rival Hawks, they stayed calm and focused on volleyball.

"It was kind of like, 'Let's get this win,'" junior middle blocker Val Wieck said. "It wasn't a sense of urgency or anxiety. It was confidence."

The Cats didn't worry after the Colorado and Nebraska losses, saying that they knew their play was improving and it was only a matter of time before they started winning — an attitude McLaughlin defended.

"We kept telling them, 'You've got to leave wins behind, and you've got to leave losses behind. Every game's different,'" McLaughlin said. "You can hang on to being 0-2, but we knew we had to come out and play a little bit better, and we played better tonight."

Cats-Cornhusker history, numbers lead to speculation

I hate math.

There's nothing I hate more, except maybe Jayhawks, onions and my birthday this Saturday. But math's definitely at the top of the list.

That's why I like this much-anticipated Wildcat-Cornhusker matchup.

You see, I like things that don't have a predetermined, absolute answer — like history. I like analysis of facts and speculation about possible outcomes rather than looking in the back of the book for the solution.

Yes, history has repeated itself several times in this series, but it all reverts back to numbers for this game on Saturday.

Numbers such as these:

RUSHING — Cats' running back Eric Hickson is ranked sixth in the Big 12 and 31st in the nation in rushing yardage, and he racked up a career-high 163 yards last weekend against Bowling Green. This we all know.

What you might not know is that Nebraska sports three players on the Big 12's top 12 list of rushers; I-back Ahman Green (No. 4 in the Big 12, No. 20 in the nation), quarterback Scott Frost (No. 7, No. 35) and fullback Joel Makovicka (No. 10, No. 49). Unfortunately, the Cats have only gained one net yard rushing against the Huskers in the past three meetings.

If, and only if, the Cats can establish this key facet early in the game while stopping the Husker ground attack will the Cats come out on top. EDGE: HUSKERS

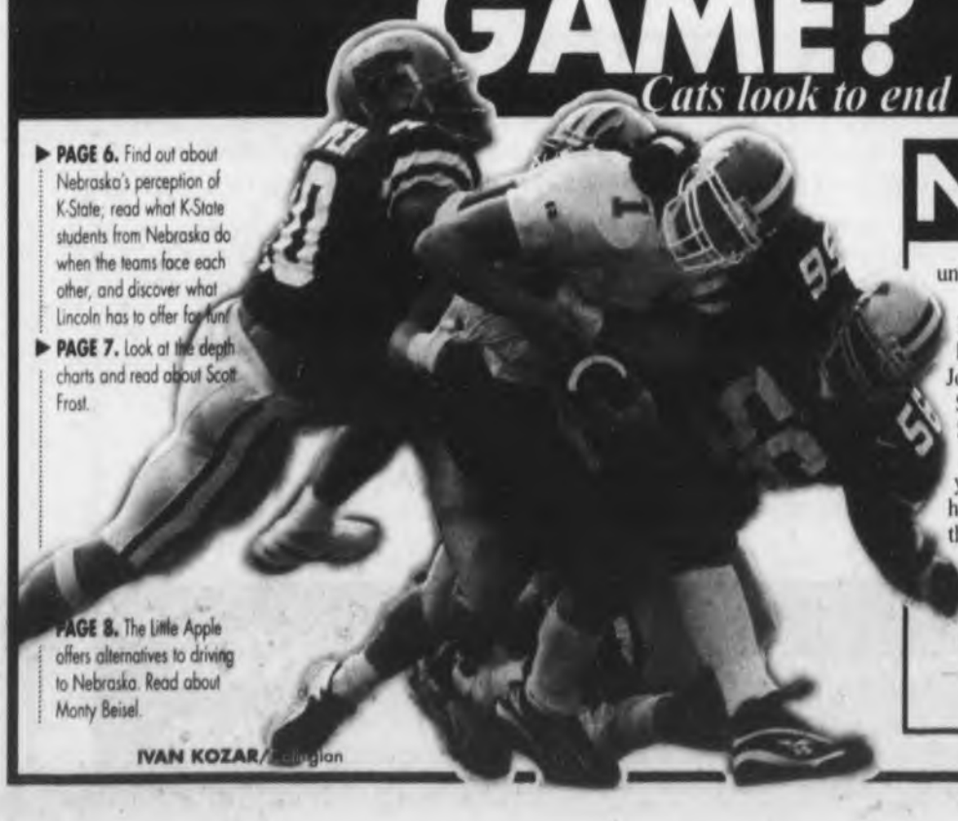
PASSING EFFICIENCY — Cat quarterback Michael Bishop sits high atop this list with a 170.2 passing efficiency rating. The next closest quarterback is Oklahoma State's Tony Lindsay, with a 151.3. Frost is at No. 9 with a 120.0 rating.

These numbers are deceiving, because Bishop has only completed 49 percent of his passes, 11th of the 12 quarterbacks on the list. Frost, who has completed 57 percent of his passes, hasn't thrown an interception in his past eight games, 34 quarters and 148 attempts.

If and when Frost throws the ball on third and long instances, the Cats must not allow completion. EDGE: HUSKERS

TOTAL OFFENSE — Nebraska lists two players in the Big 12's top 12. Frost, at No. 5, and Green, at No. 11, combine for an average of 296 yards per game. Bishop made this list as well at No. 6, contributing an average 175 yards per game. The Huskers rank No. 2 nationally in this category, while the Cats sit at No. 17. EDGE: HUSKERS

RECEPTIONS PER GAME — Neither team has any player in the top 12 of this Big 12 category, but it's no wonder since both offenses are ground-oriented.



One of several things will happen. Many surprise balls will be launched through the air from both teams, or the two quarterbacks will amass high rushing numbers as they scramble out of the pocket. Either way, the quarterbacks

New year, new team, same old story.

K-State plays Nebraska on Saturday.

The Wildcats haven't beaten the Huskers in a really long time, and they're underdogs by 21 points. But this could be the year.

But is this finally the year? K-State hasn't beaten Nebraska in its past 28 tries — the last win came Nov. 9, 1968, when Lyndon Johnson was president and K-State coach Bill Snyder was coaching at Indio (Calif.) High School.

None of the Wildcats were within five years of being born that day, but they know what happened. However, Snyder said although beating the Huskers on the field will be a tough task, overcoming their history and reputation won't be.

"My experience with young people is when yesterday's gone, it's gone. It seldom ever shows up again, and your thoughts and concerns

CAT FIGHT

STORY BY JESS C. LOUK

For K-State football fans, the statistics concerning the annual Nebraska match-up are so ugly, they might cause the stomach to convulse.

The Cats haven't won a game against the Huskers since Nov. 9, 1968.

To put that in perspective, Neil A. Armstrong has visited the moon's surface, the Cold War has ended and the United States has been through six presidents since then.

Since that chilly autumn day all those years ago, K-State has dropped the past 28 games it has played against the Huskers.

Not one player on the K-State roster was alive the last time the Cats beat the Huskers.

Since Tom Osborne took over the Huskers, he has gone 24-0 against the Cats.

Even Bill Snyder's K-State teams have been clawless against the Huskers. Snyder is 0-8 against Nebraska.

Yes, history can be harsh for Wildcat fans.

With all these stats, one might think the Huskers could take the Cats lightly.

"Looking at the rest of our regular scheduled games, I would say that right now, Kansas State is the most dangerous team we have left," Nebraska coach Tom Osborne said. "I just hope our fans understand that this is going to be a dog fight and it should go down to the fourth quarter."

The Huskers aim to go to the Big 12 Championship game in San Antonio, but the Huskers' aspirations don't stop there. They also want to travel to Miami on New Year's Day and play for the national championship.

Standing in their way, the No. 17 Cats roll into Lincoln, Neb., to play the No. 3 Huskers at 6 p.m. Saturday.

What concerns Osborne the most about this year's game is K-State's new quarterback, Michael Bishop. Things to look for include Bishop's mobility, his arm and his experience in playing in big games.

"Normally, their quarterbacks are more throwers than runners," Osborne said. "They will probably run a few more options than they have in years past."

The keys to the game, Osborne said, will be running on offense and stopping the run on defense.

On the defensive side of the ball, the messages of the week have been containing the quarterback and stopping the run.

Osborne said Nebraska practices have been very intense this week. The practices have been aimed at the Cats' offensive running attack. Osborne also pointed out that Bishop is just as dangerous running the ball as any of K-State's running backs.

Osborne's players seem to agree.

"They have a great quarterback who can hurt you all by himself," defensive end Grant Wistrom said. "But, playing Kansas State, our main concern is stopping the run."

Last week against Ohio, the Cats rushed for 429 yards and seemed to be making a point in preparation for the Nebraska game.

If they can stop the run, the Huskers feel they can win the ball game, Wistrom said.

"We want to be in the Big 12 championship game, and we want to be in the national championship game," Wistrom said. "We have to put an explanation point on every win, because everybody expects us to win."

LINCOLN LIFE

The home of the Huskers is a hive of football-inspired incoherence and sheer weekend bravado. Lincoln relies heavily on student vices to feed its economic base.

• THE ZOO BAR, 136 N. 14th St., is featuring local blues band Jimmy Valentine and the Heart Murmurs at 9:30 both Friday and Saturday nights. There is a standard $3 cover, but the minimum expense is always worth the music, if not the history of the perpetually hazy club.

• DUGGAN'S PUB, 440 S. 11th St. If you travel with plenty of leather, this bar will treat you like family. Generally a biker bar, Duggan's Pub also doubles as the toughest sports bar in town and the proprietor of an incredible fryer-based menu. This weekend it will play host to horn-based Chicago blues band, Bluehouse, at 9 p.m. Friday and after the football game on Saturday.

• BARRY'S BAR AND GRILL, 235 N. Ninth St. Just a few blocks south of Memorial Stadium, Barry's serves as an epicenter of pre-game and postgame activity. The bar features a giant beer garden in an adjacent parking lot, as well as local cover bands to supply entertainment. Warning: Entering this bar is like stepping behind enemy lines. Reveal your true allegiance with extreme caution.

• THE BRASS RAIL, 1436 O St. Another popular student watering hole, and recently rated one of the top-100 bars in the nation in Playboy magazine. This bar marks the eastern end of the O Street crawl.

If you're not on an entirely liquid diet on the weekends, Lincoln also boasts a few outstanding local restaurants:

• M&N SANDWICH SHOP, 2643 Randolph St., is arguably the best deli in town. Owned by a seemingly disinterested husband-and-wife team, the shop offers some of the most spectacular sandwiches in the area.

• CRANE RIVER, 200 N. 11th St., boasts a varied menu of ostrich burgers, cajun dishes and vegetarian offerings, as well as its own microbrewery.

• PAPA JOHN'S FAMILY RESTAURANT, 114 S. 14th St., stands out as a Grecian favorite in a downtown littered with Greek restaurants.

• THE HAYMARKET, a few blocks west of Memorial Stadium between Seventh and Ninth streets and P and Q streets, the Haymarket is Lincoln's historic and cultural epicenter. Visitors can sample Nebraska's wares Saturday morning during the weekly Farmer's Market.

In addition to its unusual shopping opportunities, the Haymarket also boasts several galleries and the Iron Horse Park. Located adjacent to the train depot, the park is anchored with a three-dimensional brick mural depicting the first locomotive to cross the great western plains.

The mural is the largest of its kind in the United States.

K-State or Nebraska?

For most K-State students, the answer to the question of which team to cheer for in this weekend's football game is obvious. Unless, that is, you're from the Big Red state.

Becky Forman, senior in elementary education, said she'll be cheering for K-State. Her hometown is Lincoln, Neb.

"The first year I was here, I cheered for Nebraska," Forman said. "Now, I'm for K-State, but I will root for Nebraska against anyone else."

Forman, who applied and was accepted to the University of Nebraska, decided not to go to NU because it was too close to home for her. She said the transition from red to purple wasn't difficult for her.

"It was hard for my dad and brother to accept that I was a K-State fan," she said. "Really, it was for my whole family. My uncle played for Nebraska. But it's not hard for me, because I'm here all the time."

Forman has a ticket for the game but said it's still up in the air whether she will be going. She is still looking for two more tickets for her friends.

"If I don't go, I'll definitely be watching it," Forman said.

Wieck

Val Wieck, junior in marketing, is from Grand Island, Neb. Wieck chose K-State over NU because of the volleyball program here. She is a middle blocker for the K-State team.

"That was the major reason why I decided to come here," Wieck said. "I also like the people here, and they have a good program for my major."

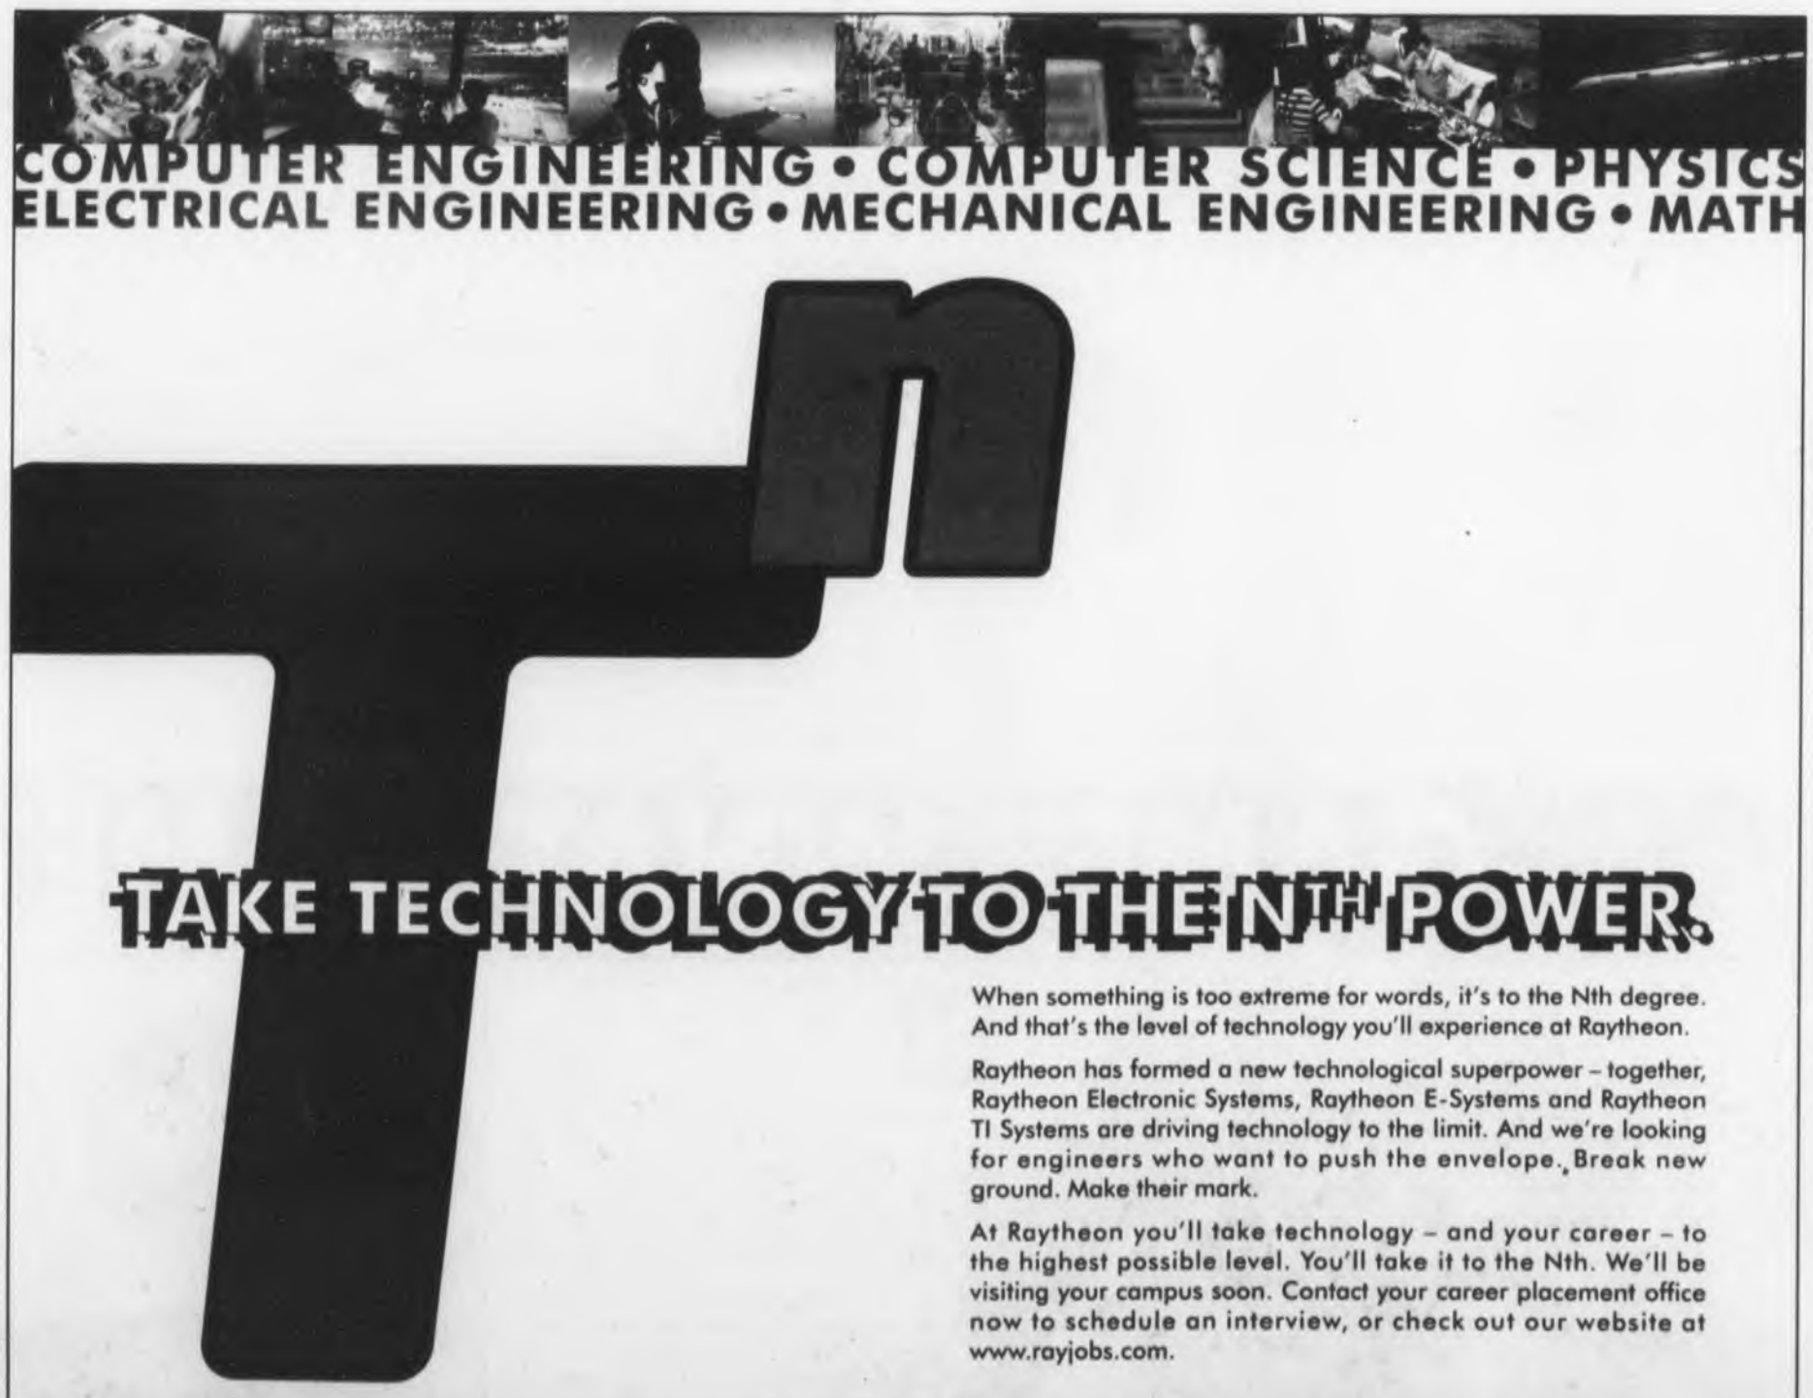
Though she is from Nebraska, Wieck said her parents didn't have a hard time accepting her decision to be a Wildcat.

"We were Nebraska fans, but we weren't hardcore like some people are up there," she said. "They still keep track of Nebraska football, but they keep track of K-State football now, too."

Wieck said she won't be going to the game this weekend. The volleyball team is scheduled to play in Oklahoma.

Jon Anderson, sophomore in construction science and management, is also from Grand Island but said he's never really been a Husker fan.

"I like the state, but not the university," Anderson said. "I always tell everyone that it was my parents who made me wear those damn sweatshirts."



Anderson's original major was architectural engineering, which NU didn't offer. When he switched majors, Anderson said he never thought of leaving K-State because all of his friends were here.

Anderson said he'll be at this weekend's game in Lincoln for sure, and he plans to bring his K-State flag with him.

Frost seeks win, respect against defensive-minded K-State squad

Frost

JESS C. LOUK
staff writer

Some people in life have a date with destiny.

Nebraska quarterback Scott Frost tried to sidestep destiny like another would-be tackler when he rushed out of Nebraska as a high school senior. Frost opted for the Stanford campus, where offensive coordinator Bill Walsh beckoned.

It didn't matter to Frost that his dad, Larry, played at Nebraska, or that the best high school quarterback in Nebraska is supposed to assume the helm of the lethal Husker option attack as a college player.

After all, playing quarterback for the Huskers is almost a birthright for the best Nebraska high school quarterback.

And that's exactly what Frost was at Wood River High School in Nebraska, where he earned All-Nebraska honors as a junior and senior.

Like most Nebraska high school football players, Frost quickly discovered that fate can't be avoided. Walsh left Stanford, and Frost, who played in the secondary and the backup quarterback role, went home.

These days, Frost is in his home state running the option attack at opposing defenses. However, some fans in Lincoln, Neb., weren't happy about that three weeks ago.

Frost was booed in Memorial Stadium after he reentered the game against Central Florida, replacing backup Frankie London.

The fans were verbalizing their disappointment because they came to see a blowout, and Nebraska had only a small lead in the second quarter.

London was slated to play one series in that game, Nebraska coach Tom Osborne said. In the Nebraska offense, the quarterback takes as many hits as the other backs. Osborne likes to get his back up snaps in games. But regardless of who is in, Osborne expects the same response from the crowd.

"I hope the crowd is enthusiastic," Osborne said. "I hope the crowd is on our side."

The following week, Frost responded to the boos by leading the Huskers past the then-No. 2 Washington Huskies on national television. In that game, Frost rushed eight times for 97 yards and completed eight of 15 passes. Frost also had a touchdown pass called back because of flags.

"They were barking up the wrong tree," Coach Bill Snyder said. "I would think the Nebraska fans would appreciate Scott Frost a great deal."

For his efforts, Frost was named Big 12 Offensive Player-of-the-Week, and the Huskers jumped to No. 3 in the polls.

"He runs the ball well, he's a strong runner, he makes good choices on options and he is throwing the ball very well, too." Snyder said. "I think he leads his football team."

Frost hasn't thrown an interception in eight games. Because Frost threw his last picked-off pass, his defensive teammates have intercepted 13 passes.

In his first season as a Husker a year ago, Frost threw for 1,440 yards with only three interceptions. Only five Husker quarterbacks have ever thrown for more than 3,000 yards in their careers.

The K-State defensive players said they are worrying about one thing where Frost is concerned.

"It would be good if we can hit Frost and Ahman Green," defensive end Monty Beisel said. "When we hit them, they'll know we came to play."

Braves, Marlins take 2-0 series lead

BRAVES DEFEAT ASTROS, 13-3

ATLANTA — In the first blowout between the teams this year, the Atlanta Braves took advantage of eight walks by Mike Hampton and again shut down "The Killer Bs," routing the Houston Astros 13-3 Wednesday to move within a victory of their sixth straight National League championship series.

In 11 regular-season games between the Braves and Astros, the margin of victory was never more than two runs — a trend that continued in Game 1 of the division series when Atlanta won 2-1 behind Greg Maddux.

The Braves, who got a three-run homer from Jeff Blauser, lead the best-of-five series 2-0 and can finish off Houston with a victory Friday at the Astrodome.

Hampton, who had only two walks in 17 innings during his final two starts of the regular season, walked four in the first four innings and got worse after getting two outs in the fifth.

With the score three-all, he threw 16 balls in an 18-pitch span, resulting in consecutive walks to Chipper Jones, Fred McGriff, Javy Lopez and Andruw Jones, forcing home the go-ahead run. Hampton, who threw only 38 strikes in 87 pitches, was replaced by Mike Magante, who gave up a two-run single to pinch-hitter Greg Colbrunn that made it 6-3.

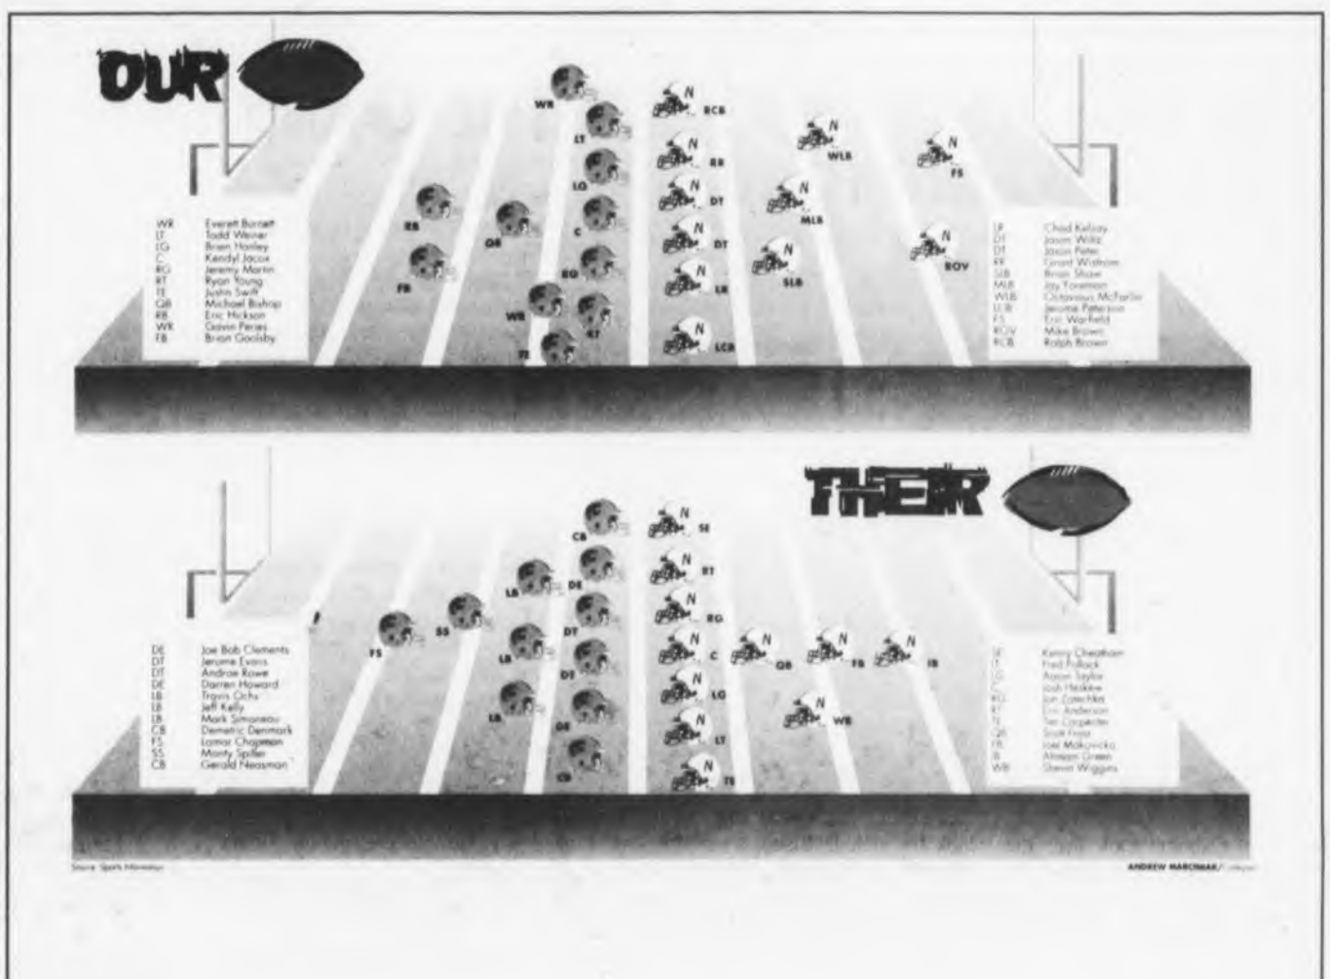
Atlanta added five runs in the sixth — four unearned — once again striking with two outs. Fred McGriff had an RBI single and two more scored when first baseman Jeff Bagwell let a high throw deflect off his glove for an error. Danny Bautista followed with a two-run single, though the inning mercifully ended for the Astros when he was thrown out trying to stretch it to a double.

Glavine, improving his postseason record to 8-9, threw a staggering 117 pitches through six innings, allowing all three runs and five hits. The Braves' bullpen got some work, with Mike Cather throwing two scoreless innings and Mark Wohlers finishing.

Blauser, hitting .588 in his career against Hampton, gave the Braves a 3-0 lead in the third with his fourth postseason homer. After pitcher Tom Glavine singled and Kenny Lofton walked, Blauser hit a 383-foot drive into the left-field seats despite a Wrigley Field-like wind sweeping across Turner Field.

MARLINS WIN WITH HOME RUN IN 9TH INNING

MIAMI — Moises Alou singled home the winning run with no outs in the ninth inning and the Florida Marlins — helped by a lucky bounce — beat the San Francisco Giants for the second game in a row with their final swing, 7-6 Wednesday.



The Marlins took a 2-0 lead in the first playoff series in franchise history. They can advance to the NL Championship Series by winning Game 3 Friday at San Francisco.

Florida won in its final at-bat for the 26th time, most in the majors this season. Edgar Renteria's bases-loaded, two-out single in the ninth against Roberto Hernandez won Game 1, 2-1.

Hernandez was the victim again Wednesday, taking the loss.

Gary Sheffield led off the bottom of the ninth with a single and stole second without a throw. Bobby Bonilla walked, and Alou — 0-for-8 previously in the series — lined a single. Center fielder Dante Powell had a play at the plate, but his throw home hit the side of the mound and bounced high in the air.

Sheffield scored easily, and jumped into the arms of his jubilant teammates.

Snyder impressed with Beisel's presence

SAM FELSENFELD
staff writer

K-State defensive end Monty Beisel finally got his opportunity to step on the field for a Division I-A team late in the second quarter of the Wildcats' 58-0 win over Bowling Green on Saturday.

"I've been waiting forever to play college football, and I finally got that chance," Beisel said. "It was big-time, going out there and getting the chills. I felt really good about how I played and what happened, and hopefully I can improve it next week."

He got off to a rocky start. After signing with the Cats this spring and standing on the sidelines during the first two games this fall, Beisel finally heard K-State coach Bill Snyder call his number.

When No. 44 took the field for the Cats, he fought off nerves and lined up as a K-State Wildcat. Wearing purple has always been a dream of Beisel's, who was born and raised in Kansas.

With his friends and family — who are from Douglass, Kan., and Victoria, Kan. — in Manhattan to watch his debut, Beisel tried to shake the butterflies out of his stomach. But it didn't work.

He said he could barely stay still as he prepared for his first Division I-A snap.

"If you look at the tape, the first time I got out there I got in my stance and I actually stumbled a little bit because my hand was shaking so much," Beisel said. "But after that, I settled down and played pretty good. I felt comfortable after that."

Snyder noticed Beisel's nervousness, but was happy with the freshman's performance.

Snyder made the decision to pull Beisel's redshirt early last week. He's the first freshman to play for K-State this season, a decision that Snyder attributed to the lack of depth and injuries of the defensive line.

"We were getting thin, and we looked at what was going to take place throughout the course of the season, and we're probably going to need a guy, and he obviously is going to be one who's going to step in and be a player next year," Snyder said. "We thought, 'Well, let's go ahead and get him ready. It's early in the season and we can get him a lot of playing time.'"

This was the first time Beisel played above the high school level, but he didn't seem to have any problems making the adjustment.

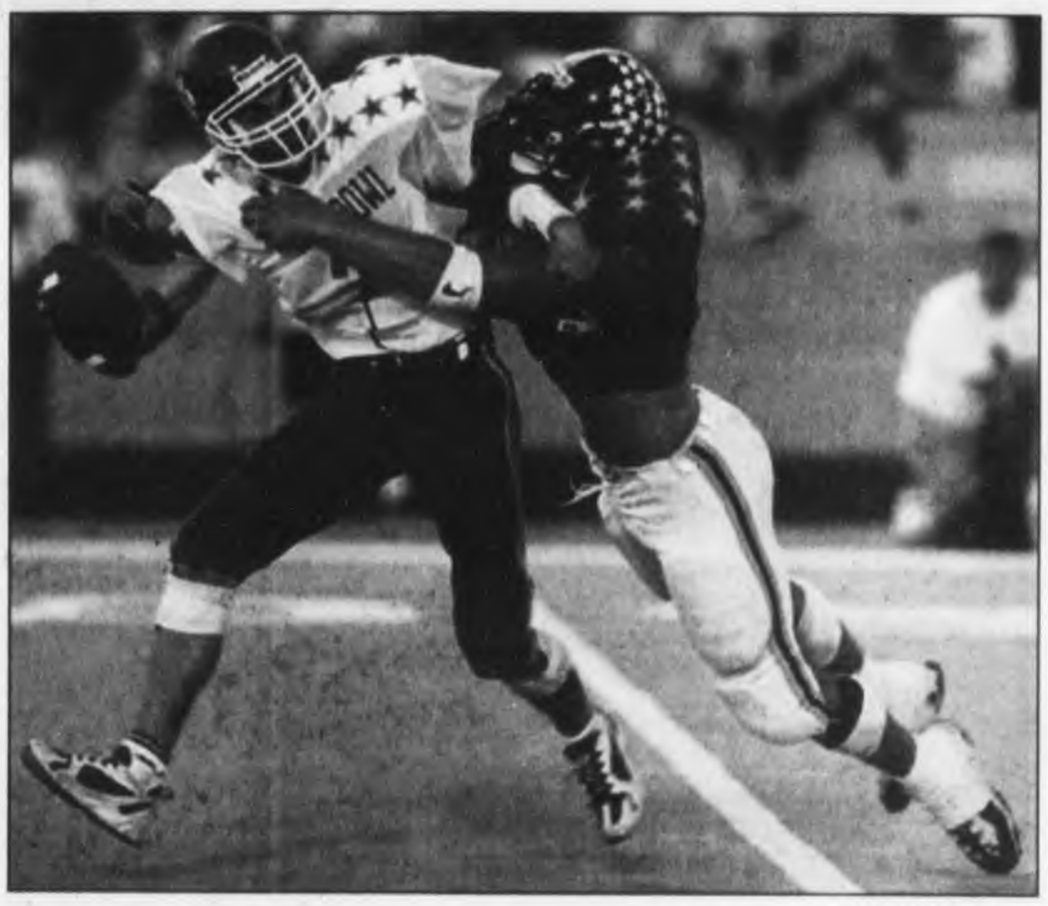
"I think he did really good," defensive end Darren Howard said. "It was his first game, and he couldn't have started his career off any better than he did."

Beisel recorded one unassisted tackle for a loss of four yards and recovered a fumble.

"College football is just bigger and faster and stronger people," Beisel said. "But you're playing with those same kind of guys on your side, which makes it a lot easier. It was pretty much what I expected."

Beisel, who played three years of varsity football at Victoria before transferring to Douglass for his senior season, will undergo a big test next week when he plays for the Cats at No. 3 Nebraska.

"I've never been up there," he said. "I'm just looking forward to getting up there and seeing all the red waves, and just going up there and kicking their butt."



Snyder told Beisel in the middle of last week that Beisel was definitely going to play against Bowling Green.

Snyder talked to Beisel's father, who coached Beisel in high school, every night last week.

Friday night Beisel watched some game film, studied the playbook and talked to his dad one last time before he tried to go to sleep and rest up for the big game.

Beisel realizes the new pressures that come with playing college football.

"Nobody cares out there. Once you get out there, you're just a player. You're a Kansas State Wildcat," Beisel said. "If you make a mistake, they don't care if you're a senior or a freshman. You're going to get chewed out for it. I figured that out right away. You have to go out there and play like you're a fifth-year senior."

Eager fans can see big game in Manhattan

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

As your friends and roommates pack for their road trip to Nebraska this weekend, you can smile and wave because there is plenty to do in Manhattan.

"We're going to hook up two or three TVs on the main floor of our house and invite a bunch of people over and barbecue," said John Berggren, sophomore in journalism and mass communications.

For those fans who want to make the road trip but don't have tickets, they can watch the game at the Main Street Cafe, a Lincoln restaurant and bar.

This bar is four blocks from the stadium and has four big-screen television and four regular televisions, said Mike Robinson, owner of Main Street Cafe and 12th Street Pub in Manhattan.

"People are more than welcome to make a road trip but don't have to go to the game," Robinson said. "We will also be airing the game here."

If you're a fan but have laundry to do, don't fear. The Westloop Coin-A-Matic and Wash Palace will be airing the game.

"You bet we'll be airing the game. That's a big deal," owner David Wataha said.

Wash Palace has a 60-inch television that will be broadcasting the game, as well as touch-screen video games, pinball, snack and drink machines and plenty of washers and dryers.

If you would rather spend the day in Aggieville, the annual Oktoberfest activities will be taking place throughout the day.

Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon will be busy with activities all day and plans to air the game for patrons, said owner Rusty Wilson.

A spokesperson for Varney's Book Store said it will air the games over their intercom system for customers and employees to hear.

Many local restaurants and bars will be offering drink specials.

Most bars have a variety of big screen and regular televisions to view the game on.

"It should be a full house and a good crowd," said Bob Limbocker, owner of Bobby T's Bar and Deli. "We are taking reservations."

Limbocker said they will probably offer some kind of Cornhusker drink or shot during the day.

"In the past we have filled up pretty early," said Rhett Butler, owner of Scoreboard. "You'll have to come early for a good seat."

Bowinkle's Sports Bar will be offering mountain oyster and drink specials for the game, said owner Heather Wasinger.

are today and tomorrow. And that's about it. Very seldom is it tomorrow," he said.

"I don't think they give a hoot what happened last year, two years ago, and three or four years ago. They just want to go out and have their chance."

So do they have that chance?

Oddsmakers in Las Vegas sure don't think so. But then again, it's been a while since any team was favored against a team named Nebraska. However, it appears the game will be decided on the field after all.

Position by position, K-State has one of the most athletic teams in its history. One of the biggest questions facing the Cats is whether they can establish a running game against the Huskers. In the past three games against Nebraska, K-State has managed only minus-one yards on the ground.

On Saturday, senior Eric Hickson will lead the Cats rushing attack in Lincoln. He's fully recovered from the broken leg he suffered before the start of the 1996 season, and he's in better playing shape than he's ever been.

He's stronger — his bench press is up to 388 pounds. He's bigger — he's put on 10 pounds of muscle. And he said he's just as quick as he's ever been. He also said he still has all his moves.

"That's all still there," Hickson said. "You never lose that. That's just instinct if you're a running back. Some things you just can't teach. Some things God just gave me."

And he stands in at 5 feet 8 inches, short enough to elude defenders.

He'll be running behind K-State's offensive line, which averages 6 feet 4 inches and 316 pounds, and has been referred to as the best line in the Big 12 by several publications this fall.

So good, in fact, that several Bowling Green players, who faced No. 7 Ohio State earlier this season, said K-State's line was the biggest and toughest unit they'd faced all year. Of course, Nebraska's defensive line, led by senior rush end Grant Wistrom, is often referred to as the best in the country and will give K-State's offensive line a challenge.

If the Cats get the running game going, the most important effect likely will be the pressure taken off the passing game.

"If you can run, you probably have the ability to throw it a little bit better, if you have the defense in a position where you're somewhat unpredictable," Snyder said. "We've scored points without running the ball, too. Of course, it's been a long time since that's happened."

But the player taking the biggest test on Saturday will be quarterback Michael Bishop. With a 4.5 in the 40, he brings mobility to the K-State quarterback position. He also has a strong arm. The Cats had a mobile quarterback who could pass two years ago with Matt Miller, but Miller said Bishop will be able to do a better job running and passing for the Cats on Saturday.

"I would kill for his athletic ability. He's really something special, and I don't even try to compare myself to that," Miller said. "I liked to run around, but I couldn't get away from people like him. I could get about 10 yards and that was it."

Meet me at Porter's for Fat Thursday.

Display cases needed for special collections in library's new gallery

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Farrell Library has some gallery space, though you'd never know it.

The gallery space is on the fifth floor and acts as a large common area between the Hemisphere Room, the administrative area, the special collections department and elevator and stair access.

Brice Hobrock, dean of the libraries, said the space was included in the plans for the library expansion to give the special collections department a place for exhibitions.

However, the space won't be used for its intended purpose until the library can arrange for display cases for the gallery. Hobrock said there isn't any money for upright or flat display cases.

"We were probably overly optimistic about its potential," Hobrock said. "There's not much wall space. We won't push its use as a gallery, at least very soon."

There were discussions last year between the library staff and the art department concerning the latter's use of the gallery for occasional exhibitions of student art work.

"We haven't come to any kind of reasonable decision on that," Hobrock said. "We are very busy trying to get this building up and running."

There will be a temporary show of Emporia, Kan., artist Hal David Berger's glass works beginning Sunday in the gallery. The show, which comprises his more recent work, will last only a week. The artist will not be present at Sunday's dedication to the new Hale Library.

Gallery space on campus became a controversy last year when the K-State Student Union considered, but ultimately rejected, a proposal to eliminate the Union's gallery space in its renovation. There are only three formal spaces for student art on campus: the Chang Gallery in Seaton Hall, the Union Gallery and the Willard Gallery.

The special collections department had little display capabilities in the old Farrell Library. A few cases located outside the department's former fifth-floor offices were all that was available for the exhibition of rare books, campus history and literary samples.

Tony Crawford, chair of the special collections deptartment and university archivist, said the old display area wasn't adequate for security and space needs.

"We really didn't have this kind of space in the old library," Crawford said. "Now the fifth floor is secure and can be locked up during evenings and weekends."

Crawford said the library staff hasn't discussed the space since it was initially conceived during the planning of the Hale addition.

"On the fifth floor with our collections, it would be an excellent place to showcase some of our wonderful materials," Crawford said. "It certainly would be an opportunity for someone to contribute the funds."

Crawford said the special collections department has some older cases, but that they are in poor shape and are mismatched.

"We don't have the exhibit cases," he said. "We'd love to exhibit our material, but the money has to be raised to get the cases that would look attractive in that area."

The Department of Art would also like to use the gallery, although talks between the library and art department have been shelved since last spring.

Anna Holcombe, head of the art department, said the gallery isn't the easiest space for art because there is a high wainscotting and bright colors on the walls.

"We wouldn't want to depend on it for any serious exhibit," Holcombe said.

She said the negotiations became cursory after the library staff began to realize how complex running a gallery can be, when the issues of insurance and security are considered.

"It needs a little more time to work itself out," Holcombe said.

The more pressing issue, in Holcombe's view, is when the library will move its media collection from Willard Hall to the library. The art department was to have moved into the media collection space on Willard's first floor.

Holcombe said the art department needs the space for a three-dimensional design shop for woodworking tools and to cut and stretch canvas.

The painting classes have been moved to Willard and students still have to use West Stadium for their woodworking needs.

"I'm going to wait for some of this dedication thing to be over and then I'll talk to them," Holcombe said.

The Friends of the Library, the support group that raises money for various library projects, is looking into many possibilities for fund raising, one being the gallery space.

Denison demise nears reality

PLANS ARE in the making to demolish Denison Hall. It is not known where the English department, located in Denison, will be moved.

TRAVIS D. LENKNER

The story is the same, from K-State's architect, dean of arts and sciences and president.

Denison Hall's days are numbered.

Plans are in the making to demolish the post-World War II building. Sources said the home of the Department of English would be demolished in favor of larger offices for faculty, better classrooms for students and a more attractive open space south of the new Hale Library.

There's only one problem.

No one knows where to move the English department.

"We know all of the classes and lectures can be rescheduled to other buildings, but until we have a place to put the faculty, staff and GTAs, it's not a good idea to tear the building down yet," said Director of Facilities Planning and University Architect Jerry Carter.

Destroying Denison has been discussed for years, Carter said, even during preliminary planning stages of the Hale addition.

"At one time during planning for the library, we looked at two options. The first option was taking the addition to the library east, which is the option that we chose. That required us to raze the old Art Building. The second option we looked at was going south," he said.

Even after eastern addition plans were finalized, the university moved to destroy the building instead of remodeling it, Carter said.

"As we neared the end of construction on the library, we approached the Board of Regents and the Kansas legislature to ask both of them permission to raze the building," he said.

"When we looked at what it would take to go in and renovate that building and spend time and money to upgrade the classrooms and upgrade the offices, we determined that it would be better for us to send those monies in some of the other facilities where it would be easier to do the renovations."

Carter said the poor design and condition of the building made it an easy target for demolition rather than remodeling.

"Anybody who has had class in some of those rooms would be of the opinion that they are not some of the best rooms on campus in terms of their layout, energy use and comfort factor. The faculty offices are small in their layout and very crowded," Carter said.

ACTER
Theater group energizes Shakespeare

SIMON DAY, of A Center for Theater Education and Research, practices vocal exercises with Manhattan High School students Wednesday at the Manhattan Center for the Arts. Five ACTERs are spending the week in Manhattan.

Theater productions are here today and gone tomorrow — or so the story goes.

But ACTER, A Center for Theater Education and Research, spends a little more time in a community than the usual one-night performance.

The group is doing a week-long residency in Manhattan this week. Its five members from London include Simon Day, Suzanne Packer, Richard Simpson, Lucy Tregar and Terence Wilton. Since the actors arrived in Manhattan on Monday, they have been teachers, community entertainers and workshop presenters. Their goal is to change the way Shakespeare is traditionally taught by adding a little energy to it.

"We teach Shakespeare from a different point of view," Wilton said. "We go in and simply ask questions, and we use the energy we find in the room."

One ACTER presentation was a one-person dramatic reading titled "The Diary of a Madman." Day presented the reading at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday at the Manhattan Center for the Arts. This Nikolai Gogol piece was translated from the original Russian text by Eric Bently. It recanted the thoughts of a civil servant living in St. Petersburg, Russia, in the 1830s.

"The diary tells of a man falling in love with the boss's daughter. He descends into madness after trying to figure out how he can better himself to impress the daughter," Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said.

"It's a very powerful work dealing with the inner workings of a person's mind," he said.

ACTER also sponsored an acting workshop for 20 Manhattan High School students on Wednesday afternoon at the arts center.

Day and Packer led the workshop, which concentrated on performing Shakespeare and focusing on how to make the words work, said James Hamilton, workshop coordinator and head of the Department of Philosophy at K-State.

Students used scenes from "Romeo and Juliet" to polish their presentation skills.

"The whole aim is to get students out of their chairs acting with the actors," Cynthia Dessen, general manager of ACTER, said. "They want to show students how the words spring to life when speaking them."

The actors used a similar approach when teaching in the K-State classrooms. The group worked with 10 classes during the week. In these classes, the actors stressed the importance of the text, rather than the use of costumes and props.

"The emphasis is on the language and imagination. It's a different kind of Shakespeare," Dessen said. "The whole emphasis is on the words."

On campus, members from ACTER used scenes from their upcoming performance "Measure for Measure" in teaching the classes. Some actors used other Shakespeare pieces, such as "King Henry V" and "Antony and Cleopatra."

Actors Simpson and Wilton conducted presentations in two classes of Ann Warren, British literature instructor.

"Richard Simpson took the class through a line by line reading of a scene from 'Henry V' when the people were worried about going to battle. We only did 25 lines but very intensely. He had the class going through it word-by-word and being expressive with what the words meant," Warren said.

Wilton expressed a similar emphasis but with a different Shakespeare play.

"He chose three students to act out a scene in 'Measure for Measure.' They were a little bit embarrassed at first, but they got into it," she said. "All the students loosened up. It was just amazing."

To wrap up the residency, ACTER will perform "Measure for Measure" at 8 p.m. Friday in McCain Auditorium.

The production highlights the downfalls of Elizabethan society, many of which still plague society today. In this play, Shakespeare searches for a stance between law and morality and examines human behavior affected by emotional stress.

ACTER will present the play using only five actors cast into the production's 20 to 30 different roles. They will use minimal props, lighting and costumes. Several chairs will be their only props and will function as tables, cauldrons and thrones.

"They really create the show from scratch based on Shakespeare's writings," Dessen said.

The Kansas Arts Commission and the National Endowment for the Arts funded "Measure for Measure" and the off-campus activities. The K-State Fine Arts Fee funded the campus residency activities in the classrooms.

Manhattan is one of eight stops for the group. ACTER will travel to Ohio for its next residency.

The Others
"Can't Help But Cry"
(360 Twist! Records)

Hitting you with a blast from the past — specifically 1966 — is The Others.

The Others hail from Italy, but they don't sound very Italian. Instead, they sound a lot like British bands The Small Faces and The Byrds.

Vinyl Review

And they sing in perfect English, without a noticeable accent.

Their music is a mix of pop, garage rock and folk to create a vibrant, upbeat and fun single.

The title track "Can't Help But Cry" is a wonderful shot of pure pop music that will brighten your day immediately.

It flows from the speakers gently and effortlessly.

They also take on Gene Clark's "Elevator Operator" and make it sound true to the original.

The B side's two tracks are just as strong as the A side.

"Do You Believe What I Say?" has a bit more of a garage rock influence to it, with its slightly distorted guitars, but it still remains very poppy.

It will make you twist the night away, for sure.

The closing song, "You'll Never Know," is another straight-up pop song.

It's a great song to sit back and sip a drink to, rather than dance like crazy.

The Others are wonderful. This single reminds me of something I would have heard on "Ready, Steady, Go" back in the '60s.

The Mount McKinleys
"Genius In Modern Music, Vol. 2"
(360 Twist! Records)

Besides having the coolest band name I've heard in a long time, The Mount McKinleys really know how to kick out some garage rock stompers.

These five guys call Pittsburgh, Pa., their home, thus reinforcing my belief that there must be something in the Pittsburgh water system to produce such great bands time and time again.

The three songs on this hunk of vinyl are amazing.

The A side song, "No Come Down," is fast, mean and raw. It hits you before you know it and is over before you can return the favor.

It even has a tambourine providing additional rhythm.

The double B side is just as much of a killer as "No Come Down."

While listening to "Blue Spell," I can imagine these guys just pounding away and rocking out to a half-full bar of drunken fools screaming away while the band plays on.

The double-time bridge comes out of nowhere, but it works well.

"Here Comes Last Summer" is a fun instrumental number that retains the garage rock sound but has more of an upbeat vibe to it.

Once again, The Mount McKinleys add a tambourine and even hand claps.

This song brings up memories of summer. It's upbeat and fun.

This should have been the song that was proclaimed the "hit of the summer," not that "Fly" song by Sugar Ray.

This is a fantastic single. "Genius In Modern Music, Vol. 2" couldn't be a more appropriate title.

360 Twist! sure knows how to put out some great singles. These are just two of them.

After 47 years
4-H secretary retires

HANG NGUYEN
staff writer

After 47 years as the 4-H secretary, Georgia Wertzberger, 65, is ready to retire from her first job.

As a new graduate of Alma High School, Wertzberger went straight to business school in Topeka. Soon after she took the state civil service exam and passed. Her name was put on the active register, and she began receiving notices of job openings.

In 1950, Wertzberger, at age 17, was asked to interview for an office position in the state 4-H office at K-State where she would make around $130 a month.

"That was a lot of money back then. This was right after the Depression and World War II; the economy wasn't so good," she said. "All I could think about was getting a job and going to work — and I did, for 47 years."

Wertzberger credits her mother for helping her get her first full-time job.

"My mother said, 'Take it. You'll always be around young people,'" she said.

Since then, Wertzberger has logged more years of service than any other classified employee at K-State. Her services were recognized by President Jon Wefald when she received the Classified Employee of the Year award in 1995.

During her 47 years, she said she has seen a lot of changes at K-State.

"My how it has grown," Wertzberger said. "I remember when Thompson Hall used to be the cafeteria and the Union was just a little building made of Army barracks. I used to work in one for six years — it's now called Cardwell Hall. The barracks were hot in the wintertime and hotter yet in the summertime."

Gary Gerhard, assistant director of Extension 4-H Youth Program, said he remembers those times as well.

"When she started her job, dictation and shorthand were the norm. Now she's skilled with a Pentium processor. Georgia has seen 4-H in Kansas change from a rural program to a program that meets the needs of young people in big cities as well," Gerhard said.

Wertzberger said her reasons for staying in her job for 47 years were fairly simple.

"I liked the people, the work and K-State. I'll miss the people the most," she said.

Gerhard said she has stayed young because she relates to young people. She's never gone stale.

Being an avid K-State sports fan, she said her retirement will have its advantages.

"I always try to go to every football and men's and women's basketball games. I think I've missed 10 or 12 games in 45 years," she said. "I'll travel and continue to be a volunteer for youth causes, too. But as a basketball season-ticket holder since 1951, I'll retire in Manhattan so I won't miss any games," Wertzberger said.

Ramaswamy new head of the entomology department

NATE JENKINS
staff writer

Sonny knows bugs.

Don't be alarmed, Sonny Ramaswamy doesn't claim to know any personally, he just knows about them. Where they live, why they talk, and even what they may be talking about.

Ramaswamy is the new head of the Department of Entomology and to him, common insects seem delightfully uncommon.

Born and raised in India, Ramaswamy received his bachelor's and master's degrees in agriculture at the University of Agriculture Science in India. His interest in insects and their relationship with agriculture was sparked there, and in 1976 he moved to the United States to further his education.

After earning his doctoral degree in entomology at Rutgers University in New Jersey, Ramaswamy went to Michigan State University and did post-doctoral research on pests of spruce and fir trees.

"I've always been a researcher and teacher, and I thought this would be a good chance to look at administration, to lead a department," he said.

Although Ramaswamy's new position won't allow him to teach any classes, he will continue to do extensive research in his area of expertise sexual behavior and communication between insects. To help aid in his research, Ramaswamy brought four post-doctoral students with him from Mississippi.

An insect's sexual behavior is not much different from that of any other animal. Males and females are attracted to each other before they reproduce, and they use signals to do the attracting. For humans the signals are mainly visual. For insects they are chemical.

Ramaswamy's job is to learn more about those signals.

"One aspect of the research is to determine the chemistry of signals that females emit, the smell that is used to attract males. Another aspect is to understand the development of eggs in females and the hormones involved," he said.

Sonny said that the research could produce practical results for farmers, and products from his research have already been used in Mississippi, Alabama, Michigan and parts of Canada.

"We are finding ways of preventing sexual communication from taking place, preventing eggs from developing, so that without using insecticides pests can be controlled," Ramaswamy said.

This could be good news for farmers, especially since K-State is a land-grant institution. As a land-grant university, K-State provides extension services to the state as well as doing research and teaching students. The knowledge that Ramaswamy and his colleagues acquire from research is readily available to farmers and the general public at local extension offices throughout the state.

Ramaswamy is optimistic about the role the entomology department plays in educating students as well as curious citizens outside of the university In his first term at K-State he has already seen a promising demand for information.

"We get dozens of phone calls every day from people outside the state, even outside the country, asking different questions about insects. From backyard gardeners to a rancher with 10,000 head of cattle, to a wheat farmer in southwest Kansas with 30,000 acres of wheat and a pest problem. The department is really a great resource," he said.

Groups requesting funds must turn forms in by Friday

CATHY BACH
staff reporter

Groups filling out Student Governing Association budget request forms must have them turned in no later than 4 p.m Friday at the Office of Student Activities and Services in the K-State Student Union.

Request forms must be filled out by groups requesting funding for projects next semester or special allocations this semester. Groups may submit up to three project requests for approval.

Jim Endrizzi, adviser for the International Coordinating Council, said the form itself is easy to fill out and clear cut.

Endrizzi said the ICC has old budgets on file, which it uses as guidelines by modifying the old request amounts and adding the change in cost of the event for this year.

Indira Reddy, president of the India Student Association and graduate student in grain science and industry, said her group received guidance from previous presidents and incorporated their own ideas.

"You may not get everything you ask for, but you get what you need," Reddy said. "The budget workshop answered a lot of questions about filling out the form. It was simple to fill out."

Both Endrizzi and Reddy said the form takes about 15 minutes to fill out.

Gabe Eckert, Allocations Committee chair and junior in agricultural journalism, said groups will be notified by the Allocations Committee of approval and guided through the allocations process less than a month after the form is turned in.

Eckert said groups exempt from the deadline are departmental clubs, fine arts organizations and sports clubs.

Those groups missing the deadlines will be reviewed on a case-by-case basis to see if they are still eligible for funding.

"It is very important that they get it turned in on time," Eckert said. "They may not receive funding."

Eckert also said the process is open to new organizations.

"I encourage new groups to turn in budget requests and to seek funding for projects they would like to do," Eckert said.

Overweight teen-ager takes fatal overdose of pain-killers after suffering years of torment, teasing from classmates

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — For three years, Kelly Yeomans endured taunts of "fatty." Her teen-age tormentors threw salt in her school lunch and dumped her clothes in the garbage. Last week, they pelted her house, first with stones and finally with butter and eggs, the ingredients for cake.

The chubby, sweet-faced 13-year-old told her parents she couldn't stand the abuse anymore. While they slept on Sunday night, she took a fatal overdose of painkillers.

Police have arrested four neighborhood boys and one girl, ranging in age from 13 to 17, and say more arrests are possible. However, the arrested youths were not charged with any crime and were released without bail. It was not clear what would happen to them because all are juveniles, authorities said.

Even in a country where bullying is commonplace, Kelly's death came as a shock and the media have given wide coverage to the tragedy.

"She was a bubbly, charming little angel who would do anything for anybody," said Ivan Yeomans, Kelly's father. "We were just an easy target and they are cowards, but I hope they can sleep at night after what has happened."

Kelly lived with her parents and 16-year-old sister Sarah in the working-class Allenton neighborhood of Derby, 130 miles northwest of London. She played the tambourine in the local Salvation Army band and visited elderly patrons at its Allenton center.

But her sister said Kelly was regularly teased about her weight and was abused at school and in her neighborhood. As a result, she always left her gym class after everyone else to avoid being seen in exercise clothes.

"We tried to help her over the bullying she got," her best friend, 15-year-old Marie Porter, told The Guardian newspaper Wednesday. "She didn't talk about it much, but they didn't let her alone."

Neighbors said a gang of up to 15 youths gathered outside the family's house for several consecutive nights last week. They attacked the home several times, throwing a block of margarine through the window, shouting abuse about lard and fat, and calling her "smelly."

"It was after that Kelly told us 'Mom and Dad, it's nothing to do with you but I can't stand it. I'm going to take an overdose,'" said her mother, Julie Yeomans.

But, her mother said, she and her husband never thought Kelly would kill herself. They knew only that she was depressed.

Michael Shaw, head teacher at Merrill College, the high school that Kelly attended, said Wednesday that she had complained about bullying at school only once — after the salt incident in February 1996.

Last week, she told a teacher her family was being tormented at home, and the teacher suggested they contact the police or a lawyer, he said. It was unclear whether they had done so.

DENISON

English department head Lawrence Rodgers said none of the English faculty have ever been attached to the building.

"We've never liked Denison. Nobody else ever liked Denison. We're happy to move when better space is available, and until then we're making due here," Rodgers said.

Other reasons besides crumbling classrooms and small offices have contributed to Denison's downfall. Namely, the construction of the Hale Library addition, which closely neighbors Denison's north side.

Carter said demolishing Denison would improve the appearance of the library and the center of campus.

That was one factor in the decision to destroy the building, he said, but a small one.

Still, the extra open space on campus could help to right some planning wrongs from years gone by, Carter said.

"There were some planning decisions made in locating some small buildings on campus after World War II that I believe my predecessors and I have questioned whether or not those buildings should have been placed where they were," he said.

President Jon Wefald said open space on Hale's south side would help to improve the new building's appearance.

"Once Denison is down, just think how nice the library will look," he said.

Dean of Arts and Sciences Peter Nicholls, who oversees the English department and whose office window view looks toward Denison, said he agreed that Denison's disappearance would improve Hale's looks.

"I'm looking out of my window right now and Denison really does block the view of the library. It's definitely not one of the finer buildings on campus. It would be good if we could find better accommodations for our faculty and for our classrooms," he said.

But Nicholls said those who are chomping at the bit for Denison's demise might have a few years' wait.

"We don't know what the specific timetable will be, but we won't sit around for 10 years waiting for something to open up. It's going to happen, I predict, within the next two to three years," Nicholls said.

Senior administration officials are searching for a new home for the English department, Carter said.

That must be found before further progress toward demolition, he said.

"Determining where we could locate the faculty, staff and GTAs is under way. I can't speculate on where those places might be," Carter said.

Others involved in the process would speculate, however, citing several different options for relocation. Nicholls said the construction of a new engineering building within the next few years could free up space for an English-department move.

"We've talked about several possibilities. One of those possibilities is that with the new engineering building that will be going up, there should be space around campus that will be freed up. There are a lot of possibilities opened up through the construction of a new engineering building," he said.

Wefald said shifting the English department could coincide with moving Lafene Health Center.

"Ideally, we would see Lafene's services move to Memorial Hospital and Denison's could move into Lafene. Lafene would be a perfect site for English. I think everybody's in agreement about that," he said.

Nichols stressed that numerous university departments are working together to reach a consensus about where the department should be.

"There are several offices on campus that are involved in this, including Facilities, our office and the president's office. We're all working on this to come up with the best solution for faculty and students in the English department. That's what's foremost in our minds. We need to do it right," Nicholls said.

Whatever the decision, Carter said reaching one is the only thing standing in the way of a stick of dynamite.

"From a construction standpoint, it won't be difficult to take Denison down. From a class schedule standpoint, I don't doubt that we can relocate the classes in that building to other facilities on campus," he said.

"But if we can't provide the faculty, staff and GTAs with office space, we shouldn't take the building down until we can."

McCahon said new funding sources would be important.

"Ultimately, we're going to have to find some new resources," McCahon said, "because if we don't get a 15-percent increase from the state Legislature every year, we won't be able to keep up with the rising inflation."

However, the solutions proposed, especially regarding the UNCOVER program, are still controversial. Some doubt it will be cost effective in the long run.

For example, Larry Rodgers, head of the Department of English, said the department's journal subscriptions amount to about $13,000. If it is assumed that English journal expenditures might be cut by 10 percent, the library will save $1,300.

However, if you consider the faculty of the English department publishes at least 100 articles per year, each with an average of 100 article sources, the savings doesn't hold true. If only 10 percent of those sources were accessed through UNCOVER, it would cost $16,000 per year, making the total savings a negative $14,700. It would cost the library $14,700 more per year for only one department.

This $14,700 does not include the hundreds of sources cited on each of the three to four books published by English department faculty each year. It also does not include costs of the many articles accessed, but not used. Rodgers said this number is substantial.

"For every 30 articles you read, maybe five are used as sources and cited," Rodgers said.

However, Rodgers' concern is not only that the electronic system might cost more to the university now. He is also worried about free access for faculty and students in the future.

"The worry is that unless the university can assume the cost associated with on-going purchase of articles accessed in journals, ultimately the cost will be passed on to faculty and students," Rodgers said. "I'm not worried about now — I'm worried about 20 years from now."

Student Senate, Faculty Senate and the administration.

If the parties find an agreement with the terms of the proposals, it will go to the University Projects Fund Committee, a city committee, for an approval or disapproval, but Manhattan city commissioners have the final say in the process.

"It can be a long process," Reese said. "But it is so beneficial for the students and citizens of Manhattan."

Carney said he and Reese both serve on the Projects Fund Committee and that students will get a fair shake.

"We get out and see what the students want," he said. "They give us feedback and we also take in our own opinions on issues."

Bruce Snead, mayor of Manhattan, said the fund has done its job so far.

"It is a program that is very positive," Snead said. "It is very beneficial for the city, as well as Kansas State University."

Being beneficial to the city and to the campus is essential for the projects funded by this program, Reese said.

"Every student at K-State is considered a citizen of Manhattan," Reese said. "And every citizen of Manhattan uses the campus, so we try to have projects that benefit both parties."

MATH

must make accurate reads of the defenses, and the two defenses will be wary. EDGE: EVEN

Speaking of defense:

RUSHING DEFENSE — The Huskers kept last year's Cat offense to 25 total yards on 24 carries. Ugh! But that was last year. Just last week, the Cats kept Bowling Green to negative 9 yards rushing, the first time the team has done so since 1992. Granted, Bowling Green is not No. 3 Nebraska, but more than half of the Cats defensive players have been involved in Nebraska losses in the past three years.

K-State coaches nominated the entire defense for Big 12 honors last week. As much as everyone denies Bowling Green was merely a preparatory game for this weekend, how could it be anything but? EDGE: CATS

PASSING DEFENSE — In this category, the Huskers stink. Ranked No. 101 in the nation, the Huskers have allowed 48 of 79 passes to be completed for a total 761 yards. The Cats, on the other hand, have only allowed 17 of 44 completions for 306 yards. (FYI, Kansas ranks No. 1 in the nation in this category. Go figure.) The Cats rank No. 22 in the nation, and when Frost lets the rare one sail through the air, the Cats secondary will be ready. EDGE: CATS

TOTAL DEFENSE — The Cats highest-ranking position lies in this category. At No. 3 nationally, the Cats have only allowed their opponents an average 3.5 yards a game. But the Cats haven't played the Washington Huskies.

Then No. 2, the Huskies only achieved an average 1.5 yards per carry against the Huskers Sept. 20. Rush end Grant Wistrom was all over the Huskie quarterbacks, physically keeping them from completing passes six times. EDGE: CATS

SPECIAL TEAMS — Martin "Automatica" Gramatica will have his feet full this Saturday if the Cats are not able to reach the red zone.

More 55-yard kicks will be required to get the Cats on the board. Gramatica has proven he is more than capable of this performance, presently ranking first in the nation. He's batting a thousand right now, averaging 2.33 field goals per game.

Punt returner Lamar Chapman ranks 16th nationally, and averages 13.8 yards per return. If all systems are go, this is the other place the Cats could conceivably win the game. EDGE: CATS.

My prediction: The Cats' field goals will keep them in the game, along with an early, long punt return for good field position. The first two Cat touchdowns will come before halftime, and the Cats will remain within striking distance through the third. The defense will then let down, and the Huskers will amass two late fourth-quarter touchdowns to make the game look worse than it really was. SCORE: Huskers 42, Cats 20.

P.S. Just a hint, Cats: what I want for my birthday is to be dead wrong at math, again.

Messelt attributes the event's success to the volunteers, who have put in some 12,000 hours preparing for the weekend, and to the strength of exhibitors who lease booths.

"We get quality exhibitors, and it has a strong reputation," she said.

Last year around 15,000 people attended the event and members of the auxiliary is hoping for an even bigger turnout this year, Messelt said.

Plus system fails Student Senate vote, 12-40

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
staff writer

A resolution to support the implementation of a plus grading system failed in Student Senate on Thursday night.

The resolution would have recommended that Faculty Senate adopt a plus grading system, which gives instructors the option to award B-pluses, C-pluses and D-pluses in addition to straight letter grades. Plus grades would also count as .3 more than regular letter grades for grade point averages.

The proposal originated during Student Body President Tim Riemann's campaign.

The plus system resolution failed 12-40. One senator abstained.

Student Body Vice President Jennafer Neufeld said she and Riemann learned from the debate and won't give up in their search for a change in K-State's grading system, despite the failure.

"Basically, we still believe that a plus system would be a better system for K-State. But are we going to drop the issue? No. We'll still continue to look at options to change the grading system at K-State to improve the university in general," Neufeld said.

Neufeld, who argued for the proposal in the meeting, said in her debate that a plus system would boost K-State's reputation.

"My question for you is ... how do we improve this university? Tim Riemann and I really feel that by improving the grading system that we can make this happen. We believe that a teacher's ability to separate the very best students from the very good students and the good students from the medium students and so on gives a university credibility," Neufeld said.

After brief debate on the original resolution, Faculty Representative to Senate Phil Anderson introduced an amendment that recommended a plus-minus system instead of a plus-only system. Anderson said his proposal would give instructors even more options when handing out grades.

"I agree with Vice President Neufeld, but I think this is of even more benefit to the students. It allows us to give 12 grades rather than eight grades," he said.

He also said a plus-minus system could keep students from "coasting" through the end of the semester.

"I've noticed in my classes under the traditional system that as we get close to the end of the semester and students are watching their points add up, they can kind of coast into a B when they realize that they can't get an A. Sometimes their work falls off. I'd rather leave the carrot out there. I want them to hustle a little bit for that B-plus or that A-minus," Anderson said.

But in negative debate, Arts and Sciences Sen. Greg Cleaver said the plus-minus system would hurt students.

"You've all heard some teachers who brag about how hard it is to get an A in their class. We don't need to be making it any harder for the students of this university to get an A. It's hard enough as it is," he said. "If you went out there and talked to your constituents, I would be very shocked if they all said, 'Yes. Please give us a minus system. We want to work harder to get an A. We want it to be harder to get a 4.0.'"

The plus-minus amendment failed 21-32.

RESOLUTION 97/98/27 PASSED 44-0. This resolution set standards for the reports that will be submitted to the Privilege Fee Committee by campus services that have fees up for review this year. A successful amendment also requires those groups to propose how they would generate revenue if their fees were cut.

RESOLUTION 97/98/28 PASSED BY UNANIMOUS CONSENT. This resolution set Student Senate priorities for the City/University Tax Fund to be spent in 1999. The priority list, along with a list from Faculty Senate, Classified Senate and the university administration, will be submitted to the fund's administrators for consideration. Proposed projects include a pedestrian/traffic stoplight at the intersection of Thurston Street and North Manhattan Avenue, additional street lighting in Jardine Terrace Apartments and a pedestrian/traffic stoplight at the intersection of Denison Avenue and Jardine Drive.

RESOLUTION 97/98/29 PASSED BY UNANIMOUS CONSENT. This resolution establishes a priority revision within the City/University Tax Fund that recommends the placement of a traffic controller at the Claflin Road and Mid Campus Drive intersection be delayed until other projects on the priority list are completed.

RESOLUTION 97/98/30 PASSED BY UNANIMOUS CONSENT. This resolution requires most senators to visit three groups during their term, one of which must be a University Activities Board group. Graduate senators, committee chairs and the veterinary medicine senator are to make two visits.

Texas Tech athletes declared ineligible

ASSOCIATED PRESS

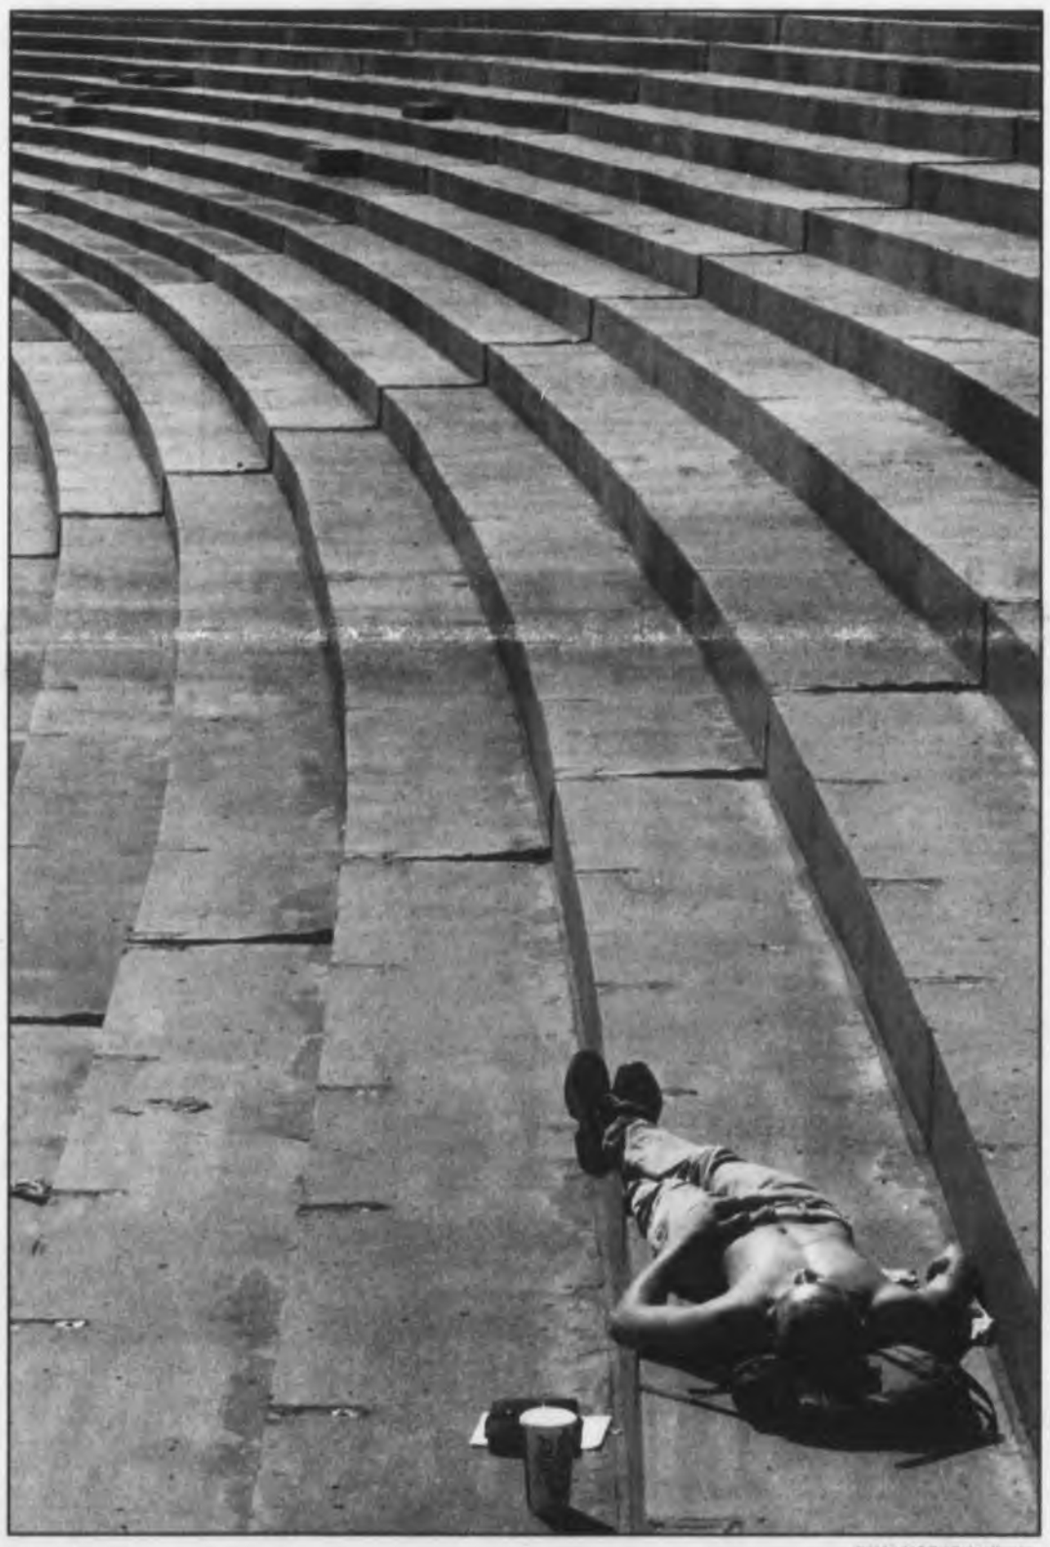
LUBBOCK, Texas — Seventy-six Texas Tech athletes in eight sports competed ineligibly in the past six years, leaving it up to the NCAA whether the school's 1996 men's NCAA basketball tournament run and other games are in jeopardy, officials announced Thursday.

The ineligibility announcement was made as athletic administrators released the results of an audit conducted by an Overland Park, Kan., law firm that specializes in NCAA compliance matters.

Since the 1991-92 school year, according to the audit, athletes in football, men's and women's basketball, baseball, women's soccer, men's tennis, men's track and women's volleyball competed ineligibly at one time or another.

The audit said 25 football players were ineligible to compete in 1993-94 and 16 the next season, the year the Raiders won the Southwest Conference championship.

The women's basketball program had ineligible players in three seasons. However, the 1993 NCAA national championship squad didn't appear to have any certification problems.



New compliance director Robert Burton said it wasn't clear whether the school would have to forfeit past victories or return the $120,000 received for the men's basketball team's two NCAA Tournament victories in 1996.

Most of the violations occurred because of misapplication of revised NCAA certification rules passed in 1992, auditors concluded. The problem areas were rules governing the minimum number of hours taken and minimum progress to a degree.

The report, compiled by the school with the help from the law firm of Bond, Schoeneck & King, also found that the school paid out too much scholarship money in baseball, football, men's golf and men's track.

The NCAA has accepted the audit as part of its 1 1/2-year inquiry into allegations of improprieties in the athletic program, Burton said. He added that he's confident there aren't further compliance problems that the NCAA might uncover later.

Burton added that the problems appeared to stem from mismanagement, not intentional rules violations.

Harmony week tries to break down myths, ethnic stereotypes

LAURA POPE
staff reporter

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week was just an idea for Barbara Baker, a former graduate student in college personal services, until one night a celebration in Manhattan turned to discrimination.

"Several Puerto Rican students went to Bushwackers in Aggieville to celebrate 'San Juan' and derogatory signs were put up in the bar," said Baker, the K-State Academic Services Coordinator. "It was a shock to the community and students."

▶ Looking for a schedule of events? A complete schedule of events can be found on the eCollegian at collegian.ksu.edu.

The incident wasn't the initial reason to start the harmony week, but it did justify the need for harmony, Baker said, and that students were being progressive and advocating for change.

She developed the idea of having a week devoted to racial and ethnic harmony and presented it to the student body president and cabinet members.

"A lot of people believed in me and this vision. I couldn't have done it without them," Baker said.

She said they saw it as a way to get students of color, and other races, involved with more issues and activities on campus.

"It was really exciting that first year," she said. "We tried to get faculty, staff, students and the community to be part of the planning."

The resistance that the event faced was like that of any other new event, Baker said.

"We made ourselves available to those who didn't know what was going on or what to expect," she said. "Our main job was mentoring people and explaining the concept."

Tibi Marin, graduate student in science education, said that harmony week is not just uniting the different cultures, but the entire world.

"This is the most important event at the university," Marin said. "We've been fighting for a long time, and we still are."

The harmony walk is one of the main events of the week for organizations, groups and individuals to participate in.

Baker said the walk was used to try to incorporate what Martin Luther King Jr. had done in the walks he organized.

"Many students bring banners or wear T-shirts promoting their group or this event," Baker said. "It is a fun opportunity and gets you very energized."

Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities in the Dean of Student Life Office, said he has been involved with the harmony week since its beginning.

Fallon said he believes the purpose of harmony week and the interfaith dialogue is to break down stereotypes so that we can better understand one another.

The interfaith dialogue session is a reccurring part of the week and will take place at 12:30 p.m. Tuesday, in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

"Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week provides an opportunity to break down barriers on campus, and provides an opportunity for understanding persons who are different from us racially, ethnically and religiously," he said.

ALCOHOL AND THE GREEK EXPERIENCE: GOING DRY

K-State fraternities consider alcohol-free living alternatives

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
staff writer

Across the country, campus fraternities are debating the decision to become substance-free environments, including several at K-State.

In the past several months, much publicity has been given to fraternities' alcohol-related events. Recently, many national organizations have adopted a mandate for fraternity houses to go dry, which some K-State chapters are seriously considering.

"A substance-free environment for fraternities would be a positive change," said Barb Robel, adviser for Greek Affairs. "It's positive in terms of risk management," she said.

Robel said then fraternity houses go dry, it reduces liability and creates a better situation for risks during a social event.

"Sigma Nu, Phi Delta Theta, and Phi Gamma Delta's national organizations have all adopted a mandate for the houses to go dry by the year 2000," Robel said.

Some chapters are mandated by an outside agency or by local alumni, but the overall decision of going dry is primarily made by the fraternities themselves.

"Studies show that more and more freshmen want a substance-free environment in college. I think it would have a positive impact on recruitment," Robel said.

K-State already has several houses that have made the decision to go dry. FarmHouse has always been dry, and Alpha Gamma Rho adopted the same mandate about 10 years ago.

"Last Spring, Beta Theta Pi and Sigma Phi Epsilon both went dry, due to judicial sanctions," Robel said.

Substance-free chapters are not to have alcohol on their chapter property. For those chapters adopting the policy, not all activities are alcohol-free.

"Chapters may have alcohol at formals and other events," Robel said. "As long as they follow the substance policy guidelines, they are permitted.

"I think we're seeing the wave of the future," she said. "I see a trend coming."

Robel said greek advisers from more schools are continuing to adopt the substance-free environment.

Campuses try approach to alcohol control

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — When it comes to alcohol abuse on campus, talk is cheap.

Administrators say colleges and universities must take action — like early-morning classes, bans on alcohol advertising and more.

"In order to tackle this very complicated problem, one has to change the environment, and it's going to take much more than traditional methods," said Elson Floyd, executive vice chancellor at the University of North Carolina.

On Monday, 18-year-old freshman Scott Krueger at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology died from an alcohol overdose after attending a fraternity party.

The school immediately sent a letter to students about its alcohol policy, but Thursday, MIT President Charles Vest went further.

The university would immediately build more residence halls to reduce its reliance on fraternity housing, prohibit the use of MIT funds to buy alcohol for events where students younger than 21 are present, and have seminars focusing on binge drinking and alcohol abuse, he said.

"I believe that what we have done, and what all campuses have done, is inadequate and not sufficient," Vest said. "And to me, that really is the basic point. We have to learn how to do better."

Four years earlier, two former MIT undergraduates said they had warned administrators about heavy drinking at fraternities and its potential for injuries and deaths. There was no significant response at the time.

Wednesday, Vest acknowledged that his administration did not respond as strongly as it could have to such complaints.

"We don't believe we waited until this tragedy" to deal with the problem, he said. "However, I will be the first to admit that the lesson of this tragedy is that we've been inadequate."

After five University of North Carolina students died last year in a fraternity house fire after a night of partying, the school stepped up its rules.

The university scheduled 8 a.m. classes on Fridays to discourage Thursday-night drinking bashes, scheduled an alcohol-free orientation event attended by 5,000 of the 24,000 students, banned alcohol ads on the radio network that broadcasts Tar Heel football games and began a campaign called "Don't Get Wasted."

Reports of alcohol-related problems are down, and the number of students referred to counseling after allegedly drinking underage has dropped to less than half of what it was last fall, UNC officials said.

Difficulties in tackling alcohol abuse come not only from students' attitudes but from administrators' response to the problem, said William DeJong, director of the Newton, Mass.-based Higher Education Center for Alcohol and Other Drug Prevention.

"The educational message is inconsistent with the kind of messages that students receive from the campus and community environment — law enforcement looking the other way, low-price promotions and campus officials who seem to have in too many cases been ambivalent about being tough or

DIGEST
FRIDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1997

NEWSrewind

News Rewind collects the top campus, local, state, national and world news from the past 48 hours. Briefs are collected from wire and staff reports.

Man arrested in brutal beating

SALINA, Kan. — An 18-year-old man has been arrested for allegedly beating a woman, leaving her blind and in a vegetative state.

Jarrod Robert Hanchett, of Salina, is accused of beating Carol Marihugh, 40, of Gypsum, Kan., on July 2. Marihugh was found sprawled on a concrete stoop after neighbors heard her screaming for help.

Marihugh's mother, Carole Anderson, said Marihugh suffered a blow to the back of her head that left her blind. Her front teeth were knocked out and her lip was slashed open.

Anderson said Marihugh developed a lung infection and later suffered a stroke, leaving her with limited mobility. She now is in an Abilene, Kan., nursing home.

The case was in juvenile court because Hanchett was 17 at the time of the beating.

Vigilante mother freed from jail

SONORA, Calif. — Ellie Nesler, who ignited a national debate about vigilante justice when she killed her son's alleged molester, hugged her two children and asked for forgiveness outside the court where a judge freed her after serving four years in prison.

Nesler, hailed by some as a hero for crime victims, was released after she pleaded guilty Wednesday to voluntary manslaughter. She was originally convicted and sentenced to 10 years in prison, but was granted a retrial because of juror misconduct.

"Although I felt justified at the time, I can honestly say I'm sorry for taking a man's life," she said, her voice cracking. "I urge anyone who feels compelled to take justice in their own hands to learn from my mistake."

Nesler, 45, fired five gunshots into the back of Daniel Mark Driver's head on April 2, 1993. Driver was in court on charges of molesting four boys, including her son Willie.

Howdy Doody memorabilia sale marks show's 50th anniversary

NEW YORK — Once, the phrase "It's Howdy Doody time" signaled an idyllic half-hour of children's television. Fifty years after America's first visit to Doodyville, those same words have come to mean "Get out your checkbook."

Vintage memorabilia from the classic kiddie show goes on the auction block this month, with everything on sale from an Air-O-Doodle Rocket Beanie (minimum bid $200) to an original Howdy marionette (minimum $5,000, expected to bring $25,000).

There's already extraordinary interest in the auction of 104 Howdy collectibles. Roger Muir, executive producer of the show, said he is not surprised. "The Howdy Doody alumni are in their late 40s or 50s," Muir said Wednesday from his New Hampshire home.

The auction marks the 50th anniversary of the show, which featured Howdy and company — host "Buffalo Bob" Smith, friends Clarabell the Clown, Flub-A-Dub and Phineas T. Bluster — and entertained children from 1947 to 1960.

Justice Department investigates Anheuser-Busch's sales practices

ST. LOUIS — Anheuser-Busch Inc. confirmed Wednesday that the Justice Department's antitrust unit is investigating how the brewery distributes its beer around the country.

Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona also confirmed that the agency is investigating distribution practices in the industry, but she declined to say that Anheuser-Busch is the target.

The Wall Street Journal reported the department is looking into allegations that Anheuser-Busch, the nation's largest brewery, is engaging in unfair sales practices that elbow smaller brands out of the market.

Industry lawyers and executives told the newspaper the probe is mainly concerned with the St. Louis-based brewer's aggressiveness in getting beer distributors to carry its products exclusively and its use of allegedly unfair marketing agreements.

Among other things, investigators are looking into a restrictive wholesale distribution contract Anheuser-Busch had its distributors sign in August, giving the company a say in practically all of their ownership and management changes, the Journal said.

Architect grateful for opportunity

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

In the past year, architect Brent Bowman has seen his local airport terminal open, construction begin on his design for the expansion of the Manhattan Public Library and his marriage to Lorie A. Doolittle Bowman.

And on Sunday, the newest landmark addition to Manhattan's built environment will be dedicated as Hale Library.

It's a project that marks a very high point in Bowman's career as a Manhattan architect since 1978, when he founded Brent Bowman and Associates.

For this 1972 graduate of K-State's College of Architecture, Planning and Design, Sunday will be his chance to be honored for taking the old Farrell Library and its hodgepodge of additions and transforming it into the harmony of Hale.

"I'll be the first to tell you I'm very proud of that building," Bowman said, sitting in the conference room of his, somewhat post-modern office in downtown Manhattan.

"What we wanted to accomplish with this building was to do a building that looked like it fit the place," he said. "That's our philosophy. We like to talk about the context of architecture. We feel really strongly that K-State has some wonderful sorts of opportunities in an urban design sort of way, but often times it's not taken advantage of."

Bowman's firm worked with the firm of Hammond Beeby and Babka Inc., particularly Tom Beeby, of Chicago, on the project. It was that firm's Chicago Public Library project, which stays somewhat true historically to the tradition of early Chicago architecture, that tipped Bowman off that it would be a good pairing.

Bowman is proud that his building takes stylistic cues from such campus stalwarts as Holton and Dickens halls and the campus tradition of Richardsonian Romanesque architecture.

"The problem with Farrell was all about legibility. No one could find their way through the building," Bowman said. "What we tried to come up with was a strategy that would unify the original building and its subsequent additions and make it a believable building, believable meaning it looks as if it could have been built at one time."

To begin the project, Bowman and his colleagues delved into campus and library history — finding new understandings about campus relationships, such as the quadrangle between the Power Plant, Leasure Hall, Seaton Court and the library. They also discovered there was never to be a similar quadrangle between Anderson Hall and the library, but that the main campus sidewalk has always passed north-south directly west of the library.

So Bowman and his team extended a loggia from the sidewalk into the main entrance of Hale as a welcoming device. Other gestures in the building include a grand entrance hall that progressively grows larger and more formal as one enters the building from the west.

"The money wasn't there to do too many grand statements," Bowman said.

Bowman has also included much detail in the building — the detail being one of the reasons the building recently won an Award for Excellence in Architecture from the American Institute of Architects Kansas.

"We had to really sell the importance of those elements to the architecture," he said. "That's not happening in K-State's recent past nor anywhere else in state projects. People can't believe the state of Kansas built a building this nice."

Bowman has enjoyed success with other local projects, most recently the Manhattan Regional Airport terminal. It was designed as a celebration of transportation and the art deco appeal of old airplane hangers, Bowman said.

Now he is working on the expansion of both the Manhattan Public Library and City Hall. Bowman and Associates do a large share of work with public schools and streetscape renovation in Kansas.

Bowman's office includes nearly 10 architects and staff members, among them being Vice President Tracy Reynolds, who had a large hand in designing Hale. The office is housed in a historic building, renovated by Bowman, overlooking the Manhattan Town Center plaza, which he designed.

Bowman said he feels lucky he's been able to stay in Manhattan and have so many high-profile projects.

"I had high hopes and aspirations. I guess I really questioned if this was a big enough marketplace to do all the things I had to do," Bowman said. "With the library, I'm flattered to have that opportunity."

Efforts culminate in dedication

JOHN HENDERSON
senior staff writer

It's taken about 10 years, $29.2 million and a lot of hard work and worrying.

But this Sunday, the library at K-State will be ready for dedication, thanks to the efforts of students, faculty and the Kansas powers that be.

Farrell Library will be dedicated as Hale Library, named for H.D. "Joe" and Joyce Hale, and looks a lot nicer than when it was known as Farrell Library, said Karen McCulloh, secretary of the Friends of the K-State Libraries, which raised three-quarters of a million dollars, matching the grant that helped pay for construction.

It wasn't the biggest or most expensive project Jerry Carter, director of facility planning and university architect, has ever helped the university start. Carter has been involved with more than $750 million in construction in his 25 years working at K-State.

Like Throckmorton Hall, a $40-million job completed in 1995, the building is ready on time, but there's still a lot of books to close up, Carter said.

"There's a lot of little things that need to be taken care of in order to have a project finalized," he said.

The Law Co., general contractor for the project, finished for just less $25 million, and another $1.7 million went for Brent Bowman, the architect. A variety of other firms were hired to examine the soil, remove asbestos, survey the land and test the concrete. There were more than 200 subcontractors in all, Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said.

While this was going on, about a third of the library's staff were moved elsewhere, and various buildings on campus were used for equipment and furniture storage, Hobrock said.

"It was a lot of dust and noise, but somehow we survived it," he said.

Funds for the project came from three main sources: state government, private donations and student fees, said Keith Ratzloff, university controller.

In May 1992, the Kansas Board of Regents authorized K-State to ask the state legislature and then-Gov. Joan Finney to issue revenue bonds through the Kansas Development Finance Authority. That year, House Bill 3207 authorized the purchase of $18 million in bonds, later increased to $19.2 million.

President Jon Wefald sent a letter of thanks to Finney, scribed with the message, "Thanks a million!"

The largest private donation, a total of $2 million in 1991, was from the Hales.

Joe Hale is former president of Archer Daniels Midland Foundation, which, along with the Dwayne O. Andreas Foundation, contributed another $850,000 in Hale's honor.

In October 1991, the Student Senate passed Bill 91/50, which pledged $5 million to be raised through student fees for the project. Ratzloff said there was some worry about the precedent, which some thought might lead to the university depending on student fees to pay for building renovation.

The bill needed two-thirds of the votes in its favor to pass. Senate approved the bill 45 to zero with only one abstention. Ratzloff said that to his knowledge, it was the first time in the state's history that students pledged their fees to pay for an academic building.

In 1996, bonds were formed, $3.815 million in principal to pay for the library. The original plan was for each full-time student to pay $9.25 per semester.

After K-State went to a per-credit-hour fee system, the plan was amended. Now all students pay $2.40 for the first credit hour and 66 cents for every additional hour. The debt will be paid off in 2015.

The state funds were spent first, followed by the donations. Student fees were only to be used to pay for what was left over, Hobrock said.

The library is still dealing with tough choices about how to support itself, Hobrock said.

However, McCulloh said, Farrell Library had serious problems with defacement of books and periodicals.

"It's really a nice facility," she said. "I hope it'll influence students to treat it with care. It's a nice place, so they'll treat it nice."

Hale family pleased with outcome from donation

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

They just wanted to help the university.

So H.D. "Joe" and Joyce Hale decided to contribute to the Farrell Library renovation.

"We were approached that K-State had quite a few needs that could be met by private donors," Joyce Hale said. "In talking it over, our kids said the library was really something that needed rejuvenation."

Initially, the Hales became acquainted with K-State through their children.

"Out of the six kids, three of us went to K-State," said Karen Young, a daughter of the Hale family and K-State alumna.

Neither of the Hale parents attended K-State. Joe attended the University of Kansas, and Joyce went to Mills College in Oakland, Calif.

Their interest in K-State began when Young attended the university.

"They were so impressed because K-State would send them information and then kept in contact with them," Young said.

The Hales' support for the university continued through the years as Joe showed interest in the milling science department.

"My father was president of the Archer Daniels Midland Milling Company," Young said.

"He was also involved in the milling college."

"He's very well-respected in the industry and has been a great help to the university," said Bill Hoover, a family friend and past president of the American Institute of Baking.

Besides their financial contribution to the library, the Hales also employed students to work on their ranch outside Manhattan.

"They're good people and strong on Kansas," Hoover said.

"They believe in helping where they see a great need."

"Their main interest is just helping people out, not the recognition," Young said.

After the construction of the library, the Hales said they are pleased with the outcome of their donation.

"I think whoever was instrumental in the building did a great job," Joyce said.

"We're just thrilled."

The Hales, both retired, have a home in Johnson County and a Manhattan-area ranch where they spend time.

Library dedication creates time to reflect on enhancing resources

Another volume in the history of K-State's library will be added with the dedication of Hale Library on Sunday.

While this is a time for deserved celebration, it is also a time to reflect on the issues that have, and will, define the new library.

The most pressing and obvious of these issues is the need for more funding for library resources. The concern of students and faculty for further funding of journals and books is testament to the library's importance on campus.

The fact that faculty have spoken up about the expense of sod to beautify the library's exterior for the dedication illustrates how the campus is concerned for every penny that could go into the library. It is truly a time to examine every expenditure on campus and justify its worth.

Now that we have built a building to house our books and resources, we need to work to improve and enhance that collection.

Speaking of the new building, a sincere thanks is owed to several people: the state of Kansas for dedicating its resources to a project of this magnitude in such tight fiscal times, the Hale family for contributing funds for something as unglamorous as a building for books and especially the students of K-State who have supported this project with a self-approved fee.

Eleven years after President Jon Wefald made the library his first priority, we finally have a new building.

However, we cannot cool this momentum. The building is only the beginning of the strengthening process. Much work lies ahead.

The Funding the Library Task Force, composed of faculty and staff from all corners of K-State, has been charged with a mission of improving the library's resources.

This commitment to seeking solutions shows the university's understanding of the library's significance as the lifeblood of academic life at K-State.

My entire life is based on lies.

And that's the truth.

I take advantage of every chance I have to deceive, to fabricate or to mislead. I seriously doubt anybody really knows me. Sometimes I lie to maintain anonymity. Sometimes I lie to glorify my life.

Sometimes I lie for no reason whatsoever.

When I go into a restaurant that has a waiting list, I'll give a fake name. Usually I call myself "Forrest" or "Turner." I'll use my mother's maiden name if they ask for my last name. I don't know why I do this — I suppose I like the mystery of it.

But all of my lies are not so innocent.

Like many other people, I lie for personal gain. Almost all people try to pad their résumés, and I am no exception. Under "work experience" I will say I worked at "Eagle Auto" instead of "Eagle Auto Wash." Sure, lying to potential employers isn't the best of business ethics, but I figure my lack of ability can be made up for in ingenuity.

Most of my lies, however, have less to do with personal gain and more to do with personal glory.

I'm a different age to about everyone I meet. If I want them to be impressed with how much I've accomplished in my life, I'll tell them I'm 18 or 19. However, if I need to be looked upon as the wise or intelligent one, I can easily transform into a 22- or 23-year-old.

Other times I will lie about seeing movies or reading books so people think I'm more cultured. I lie about the make-up of my family to try to relate to someone who is an only child. I lie about where I work, where I'm from, where I live and who I know.

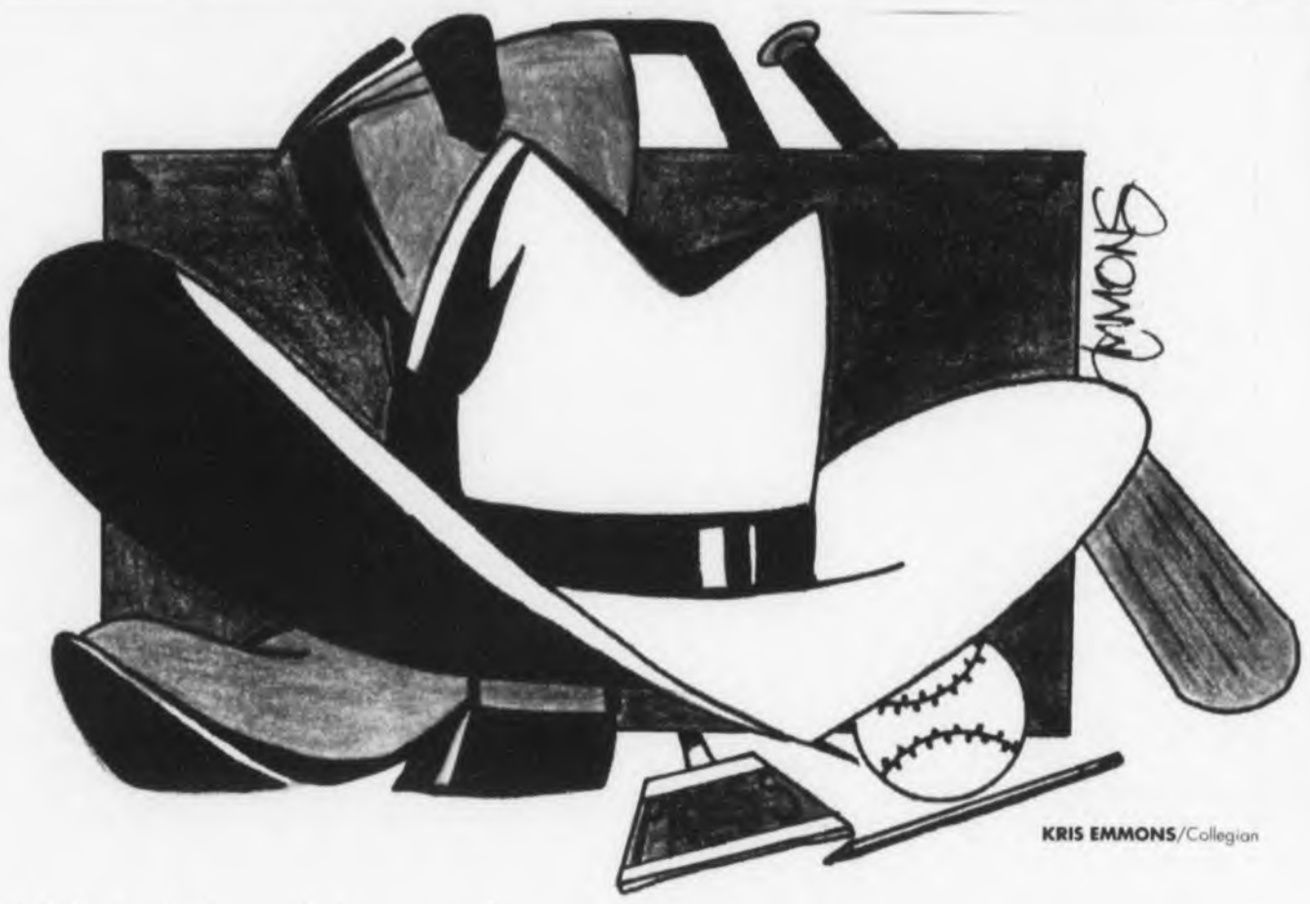
But as much as I'm trying to create a new identity for myself, I'm also trying to delete the person I already am. There are a lot of embarrassing aspects of my life, and a lot of shortcomings, as well. I suppose it is only natural to want to suppress those. Lying about them is an ideal tool.

I have a relatively large scar on my leg that is the making of wonderful stories. I told my Public Speaking class that a dog bit into my leg. I told others that it was a bullet wound and others that I was run over by a bus. I do all of this just to save face. If people knew the truth, they would see me as a klutz and not have the awe or sympathy that they would have for me as a victim.

It's not that I have an inferiority complex or some psychological disorder. I just don't see the harm in telling lies to people who I'll never see again. That is, after all, who I direct most of my falsifications to. Classmates, teachers and temporary employers all get to know an improved version of me and are none the wiser when I leave after a semester or a year.

The problem arises when one of these people and I develop a friendship — a relationship based on trust. It's hard to share parts of your life with someone when they might conflict with a lie you've told them before. In addition, friends don't want to hear that everything they knew about you until then wasn't true.

Another problem develops when I get together with two or more friends with whom I've already told conflicting stories. I remember going to lunch with two fellow employees — one who thought I was a freshman at Northwestern University and the other who thought I was a junior in high school. I kept sweating and thinking that one of them was going to ask me about school.



But they never did, and it fueled the idea that I could get away with lying so elaborately.

And so I continued to lie without second thoughts, and now I have dug myself so deep that I think it would be impossible to start over with a clean slate.

I would certainly be willing to give it the old Apollo-13 try if I thought I could trust the people around me. I would have to be accepted for who I am. I would be boring and inexperienced. I would have to expose my faults and risk my anonymity. It's a step I'm not sure I'm ready to take — even if all of these conflicts are arising because of all of my lies.

So in the meantime, I will continue to try to impress others so at least someone is satisfied with me.

And that's the truth.

Journalism major might not be the right cup o' tea

When I think back to my high school days as of late, I think of all the teachers and guidance counselors who told us it was OK to not know what we wanted to do with our lives just yet. They told us that we could spend the first couple of years of college figuring that out.

Of course, I was sure this didn't apply to me. I knew what I wanted to be when I grew up. Not a cowgirl, not a lawyer, not a pitcher for the New York Yankees (by that time I realized tossing underhand in the big leagues probably wouldn't fly.) I was going to be a journalist.

And I somehow locked myself into that at the ripe old age of 15.

So here I am, many a moon older and into my second year of schooling here at K-State; well on my way to realizing my journalistic dream of yesteryear, you might say. Only I'm not sure if that's my dream or the dream of a 15-year-old who really just didn't have a clue.

After much beating around the bush, I finally made the disconcerting realization — I don't want to be a journalist. It was something I should've realized the first time I wrote a news story for the Collegian way back when. But thanks to my keen sense of denial, I pushed that away until it finally struck me. I'm a bit slow on the uptake, you see.

The logical move would be to change majors, but as they say, "The mind is willing, but the flesh is weak." I don't know what life is like without journalism. Despite my non-affection for it, I still feel this odd kinship to it. And I also hear it's nice to have a clue before one decides to switch majors.

And I'm comfortable in the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications. The office people know me. Many of the professors know me. Most of my friends are from the school. Sure, these aren't reasons to stay on the wrong collegiate path, but those people made coming here easier, making me feel welcome. I enjoy journalism — I just don't want to be a journalist.

As far as my calculations go, I believe I'm about halfway through the journalism program, which directly translates for me into stuck. I thought I was doing myself a favor by getting a jump on general college courses in high school and taking Advanced Placement tests left and right.

And I guess I did save myself some time and money, but at the cost of being a few months into my second year of college and feeling strapped down to my major. I'm not sure it was worth it.

This is what the high school guidance counselors don't tell you about.

I shouldn't really complain because the school of journalism requires its students to have accrued 30 hours and at least a 2.5 grade point average before actually becoming a major. I dug myself into this hole, and I realize that. There are some majors here that require you to be 100-percent positive that's what you want to do from the start, thanks to the rigid structure of the programs. The hole was already dug for them. I'm sure that service is figured into their equipment fees.

Knowing I'm at fault, I'm left wondering where to go from here. I feel some sort of obligation to get the degrees I'm pursuing, like it or not. These days, going on to some sort of higher education is generally not a questionable fact. It's just something you have to do to make it in the world.

I'm grateful for the opportunity to engage in this educational experience, but I can't help but wonder what the implications are. I am spending upwards of $4,000 a year to get a degree that will enable me to earn the money that will enable me to do what I want to do. Someday.

Who says money can't buy happiness?

I'm banking on the outside possibility that this is just my mid-college crisis and after I buy a bright red, turbo charged wide-track 1997 Pontiac Grand Prix, it'll be all good once more. Maybe by then I'll come to accept that my character will soon be defined by a piece of paper.

Football coach apologizes for noisy practice

Editor,

To those who live near KSU Stadium, please accept my apology for the extremely loud noises coming from the stadium Monday evening.

It was our attempt to simulate the crowd noise created by Nebraska fans at their stadium. I was insensitive to the needs of families, school children and students. I assure you we will not do this again in the evening hours.

Reader says abortions kill innocent children

Editor,

It seems that some uninformed, unknown people have been playing with the sidewalk chalk around campus, spreading their propaganda for all to see. Because I don't own any chalk, I'll use this medium to express my opinion about abortion.

Some of the more interesting phrases written are "Hitler was pro-life" and "Be a Nazi — ban abortion." Hitler and the Nazi party were about a world order where everyone would be genetically perfect. If you did not fit their model, you were not worthy to live. If Hitler had the means to look inside a womb and see an "imperfect" baby, he would have been the first one to call for its death. So, do not compare me to Hitler or the Nazi party.

As for the subject of abortion, it seems the central question must be when does life begin or what defines life? To answer that, let's look at the differences between a baby in the womb and a baby outside the womb.

Both babies have a heartbeat. Both babies eat, digest, grow and discard waste. Both will react to pain stimuli in the exact same manner — by pulling away and opening their mouths to cry.

But one baby breathes air into its lungs through its mouth and the other absorbs it from its mother. The change from one to the other happened at the moment of birth.

Could this be that magical act that imparts life to human beings? Does breathing mean life? Sadly, no. I can hold my breath a long time, but I'm not dead during that time. When people are choking and can't breathe, we don't consider them to be dead.

If the act of breathing meant life, imagine how that would play out in court. A defense lawyer may say, "Your honor, I can prove that the deceased was holding his breath at the time of his death, therefore was not technically alive. My client is then innocent." Truly absurd.

To answer the question of how to define life, look at how we define death. It's not a lack of heartbeat that defines death. A person can be resuscitated after the heart stops beating and live a fairly normal life after that.

A person is clinically dead when all brain activity has stopped. Life seems to be defined as the period from the beginning to end of brain function. We can find measurable brain activity in a fetus just weeks after conception.

According to our own scientific understanding, abortion is nothing short of murder, but we as a society have become too obsessed with our "rights." I believe when abortion was first practiced, the fetus was not thought to be a a living human being.

Now, as science and medicine evolve, we can prove this false. However, we refuse to admit this for fear of infringing on someone else's rights. It's a sad statement to say that the right of a woman to choose has become more important than the right of a child to live.

When will the time come when people decide that their rights are more important than your right to life? Where do you think the argument for euthanasia is coming from?

It's time to take a stand. Let people know how you feel. And most importantly, write or call your representatives and senators and tell them the killing of innocent children in this country must stop.

THE BALCONY on the fourth floor shows the space of the main entrance area of the library.

A $30 MILLION TOUR

THE CATHEDRAL Room, on the third floor, is home to the four murals representing fields of study offered in the 1930s.

THE HEMISPHERE Room provides a view of Manhattan. It was created to house meetings of the library staff.

THE STATE of Kansas Seal, made of ceramic tile, is on the first floor and is surrounded by benches.

It's time to go on a $30 million tour. The tour will take you back in time, and it will familiarize you with some of the 450,000 square feet just built on campus. That's right — time to tour that monster building on campus soon to be known as Hale Library.

There are seven must-see highlights on the tour. Here's a breakdown of what should be checked out on a Hale Library adventure:

1. The entry has metal sculptures on the south doors, the balcony and the stair railings. The 7-feet-tall sunflowers are the work of Kent Bloomer, a professor of architecture at Yale University.

"It was taken out of modern architecture, and we're putting it back in, feeling it should be there," Bloomer said.

There are also carved limestone ornamentations on the outside of the building.

2. The 24-hour study room provides students with a place to study along with vending machines, restrooms and laptop computer connections. The 24-hour study room is on the first floor, and it is the only floor food is allowed on. This floor is an excellent place to visit if studying will last deep into the night.

3. The State of Kansas Seal is on the floor of the first floor. It is set in many different colors of ceramic tile, and benches surround the seal to create an inviting place to read or meet friends.

4. The Hemisphere Room is an elegant meeting room. Looking out the window gives a view across the city of Manhattan. The Hemisphere room was created to house meetings of the library staff. Carrie Reinert, freshman in clothing and textile design, said a kitchen and large table easily make this room the most comfortable one in the library.

"It's an awesome view from up here. The atmosphere is also very relaxed and cozy," she said.

5. The balcony on the fourth floor was created for no reason except to enjoy the main entrance area. It is 20 square feet, and it hangs inside the library. The view from the edge of this balcony shows just how high up you really are.

6. The "We are the Dream!" mural is also on the fourth floor. This patriotic mural was located in the former home of the Multicultural Research and Resource Center. It portrays the minority experience in the United States. It was created, partially funded and painted by K-State minority students in the late 1970s.

7. The Cathedral Room, on the third floor, is a Gothic-style room that "has been refurbished to enhance the room's loveliness," said Jan Crow, the publicity coordinator for Hale Library.

David Hicks Overmeyer painted the murals along the south wall in 1934 as a Kansas Public Works Artists project. The murals, done in oil, each measure 11 by 15 feet. The paintings represent the main fields of study offered in 1934 at the Kansas State Agricultural College. In 1996, the murals were restored by Wichita artists Louise Thiele and Esther Blackburn.

These seven additions to the Hale Library are now an integral part of the library building. The construction project redesigned the 1927, 1955 and 1970 buildings and incorporated them into the new construction.

"The additions to the library make a trip here that much more enjoyable," Crow said. "It would be nice if everyone came to see what's here."

The K-State dean of libraries said that 10 years ago, public schools weren't in the business of naming facilities after people who donate money.

Brice Hobrock, who has worked at Farrell Library for 15 years, said it's too bad that public schools such as K-State, which at one time expected full financial support from the state government, now will assume the strategy long used by private schools to immortalize benefactors.

Hale Library

But, he said, it's become a way of life. The money has to come from somewhere.

"Things don't always stay the same," Hobrock said. "Your expectations have to change. You have to readjust."

So K-State's library, once named for Francis D. Farrell, who was university president for 18 years, is being renamed for H.D. "Joe" and Joyce Hale, who donated $2 million toward its renovation.

The Hales' donation, part of about $29.2 million raised for the renovation project, paid for a lot of bricks, mortar, chairs, tables, couches, shelving, paint, wiring, plumbing and carpeting, not to mention the labor needed to put it all together.

The Hales aren't the only donors to be honored in this way. Karen McCulloh, secretary of Friends of Kansas State Libraries, said she still has to fasten many brass plates engraved with donors' names to the backs of many chairs and tables.

And there are bigger honors still to be given as part of the Farrell Library Capital Campaign. The 24-hour student study facility on the first floor of Hale will be named after Anita Lahner, a Great Bend resident who left the library $60,000 in her will, McCulloh said.

A conference room on the third floor will be named for the Montgomery family, and the fifth-floor Rare Books Gallery will be named after the Morse family next Monday.

At least 10 other rooms have yet to be named for benefactors, including the third-floor Gothic Room, the first-floor Hall of Scholars and the fifth-floor Hemisphere Assembly Hall.

It's difficult to raise money for the library, said head football coach Bill Snyder, who is still active with the Friends, and is a former co-chair with his wife, Sharon. A study carrel will be named after the Snyders and their children for a donation they made.

"The library is at least as important as anything else academic to the university," Snyder said. "But there are no alumni of the library."

Former students seem to want to give money to everything but the library, Hobrock said. Donors will usually tell the foundation to fund athletics or a specific school which is understandable, McCulloh said. It just leads to the Friends campaign strategy, she said, to name facilities in honor of the donors.

A donation of $25 will buy the title of friend. Ex libris titles are $50 and include the donor's name on the front cover of a book. Chairpersons donate $100 and receive a nameplate on a chair.

The titles go up to benefactors, which give $25,000 or more, and whole rooms can be named for them, McCulloh said.

"People who want to donate want to donate for something they can see," she said.

The Friends have been moderately successful, she said, in shouldering the task of raising $750,000 for a matching grant offered by the National Endowment for the Humanities, which gave $250,000. Separate from Foundation support, the Friends were able to use the grant to its advantage — donors saw that their money would go farther.

The library has a gala every fall, and a book sale every spring during All-University Open House, where hardbacks sell for $2 each. McCulloh said the two events earn around $15,000 for the library every year.

McCulloh said the library couldn't do without the support of President Jon Wefald and his wife, Ruth Ann Wefald, chair of the Friends, as well as Snyder and several other alumni and faculty.

"People have to understand," she said, "that if there isn't a good library, we don't have a good university."

Murals celebrate K-State history, progress as $30 million library nears dedication

MATT KREPS
staff writer

While Hale Library might be a striking symbol of progress at K-State, it speaks equally well to its past.

The Cathedral Room on the third floor of the original building showcases four murals painted in 1934 and 1935 by Topeka native David Overmeyer as part of the Public Works Artists project. Overmeyer also painted the eight murals on the ground floor of the Statehouse in Topeka.

Hale Library

The panels on which the murals were painted were included in the 1927 building plans, although a muralist and theme had not been chosen.

Overmeyer and an assistant worked 30 hours a week for one year to complete the project. The walls of the library were so porous that several coats of base paint had to be applied to each wall before painting could even begin.

While the painting was in progress, students studied at tables placed only a few feet from Overmeyer's scaffolding. The library did not have enough space to close off the room.

Each painting represents one of the four original areas of study at Kansas State Agricultural College. They are the home, the arts, agriculture and industry.

The murals are oil applied directly to the wall plaster. Each measures 11 by 15 feet.

The first, "The Home," symbolizes the family values taught in home economics classes during Overmeyer's day. In the mural, the father is the provider while the mother runs the household. Cooking, sewing and the musical and cultural interests of the home are portrayed.

In "The Arts," the Greek lamp of learning serves as a focal point from which the light of the arts radiates. The characters represent music, literature, dance, painting, sculpting and architecture.

"Agriculture" presents the different areas of agriculture. Livestock, fruits, vegetables and grains are apparent in the images. A country home and church are tucked into the rolling fields of the background, reminding the audience of traditional country values.

"The Industries" includes the sciences, engineering and other physical disciplines. Once again, a source of light, this time the torch of the industrial arts, serves as a focal point. An observatory is included in the background.

When the murals were completed, then-President Francis D. Farrell praised them for their conservative style as lasting statements to K-State's purposes.

Overmeyer's mural style is representative of his desire to depict the "Golden Age" of America while reaffirming the idea of social pride based on civic virtues.

The murals were restored as part of the $30 million renovation and addition of the library. The industry mural had extensive water damage from roof leaks during 1978.

Wichita restoration experts Esther Blackburn and Louise Thiele completed the restoration in January at a cost of about $5,000. Overmeyer was paid $200 for his original work.

"They're very beautiful," said Pat Patton, a research specialist with University Archives. "Everyone is surprised when they see them. It reminds them of an ivy-league school."

Library expansion breakdown

Hale Library

The financing of the Farrell Library expansion is broken down in the following way:

Total cost of the expansion: $29.2 million

$19.2 million	in State bonds purchased through the Kansas Development Finance Authority.
$5 million	committed by the K-State Foundation, of which $4.1 million have been raised.
$5 million	to be paid by students, not to exceed $9.65 per student per semester.
$2 million	donated by H.D. "Joe" and Joyce Hale.
$900,000	loan floated by the library.
$850,000	donated by Archer Daniels Midland Corporation and the Dwane O. Andreas Foundation.

The student contributions will pay $3.815 million to the library. The rest will go toward interest. To date $185,000 has been paid by the students.

When the debt will be paid off entirely: 2015

Journal alternate has flaws

JOHN HENDERSON
Senior staff writer

Michael Ossar can't help but think there must be a better way to save money.

Ossar, head of modern languages at K-State, has been told by the dean of libraries to cut $3,700 of his department's $12,000 budget for periodical subscriptions. That's about 30 percent, which happens to be the same as every other department.

The cost of periodicals has been rising too fast, and the library can't keep up. Ossar said the solution proposed by the library has been to make every department cut back. The plan is to drop the library's 6,600 or so subscriptions to less than 3,000 by 1998.

The library's solution was for Ossar to prioritize his list of subscriptions and report which ones were most important.

"That may seem fair," he said, "but it's really not a sensible way to cut costs."

The proposed electronic substitute, UnCover, which would fax articles from the journals it carries in its database on demand, bothers Ossar for two reasons, he said.

First of all, K-State ranked last among Big 12 schools in the number of subscriptions in 1996 and many years before that.

Journals, he said, might mean the difference between keeping intelligent people who want to study at K-State and watching them go elsewhere.

"A lot of the young scholars in my department I want to keep," he said. "But they won't stay here if something doesn't happen."

It's been argued that other schools have more expensive subscriptions, so comparisons to K-State don't fly.

Ossar said that shouldn't matter. He said what the library should be looking at is how often the journals are used by the different schools.

"That's not a calculation the library is asking us to make," he said.

The journals for "hard" sciences like math and physics contain articles that become largely irrelevant within months as technology advances, he said.

The articles in humanities journals, however, can remain viable for much longer, he said. Philosophy journals published 20 years ago are still being discussed, he said.

With UnCover, the articles are ordered instead of the entire journal. Ossar wonders whether it's cost effective to have to order the articles at inflated rates when it might be cheaper to get the whole journal.

"It seems like the library has no idea how much the journals cost," he said.

Ossar said most of the 103 subscriptions made by his department are less than $50. Other departments, he said, have subscriptions that cost thousands of

Math faculty concerned about cutback

KRIS ROBL

Some faculty members in the Department of Math are concerned about a 30-percent cut in library acquisitions.

Instructors describe the situation as a disaster. They don't believe students and faculty will have the proper materials to do effective research.

"Our library has always been underfunded," Bob Burckel, professor of mathematics, said. "Currently, we house the poorest collection of scientific journals of any library in the Big 12, and we will not be doing much better after these budget cuts.

"Right now, the university has been told that everything is available in cyberspace, so books and journals are not necessary anymore," Burckel said.

Lev Kapitanski, professor of mathematics, said continually reducing the number of periodicals will decrease the level of scholarship available.

"At this time, we can deal with these setbacks, but when there are no journals, it makes our job more difficult," Kapitanski said.

Burckel said the university is losing track of its fundamental purpose — academics and research.

"We're not comparing favorably with institutions that are our size," Burckel said. "There's a benchmark figure that says the minimum amount of money that should be given to the the library is 5 percent," Burckel said. "We are well short of that figure."

The budget cut mainly decreases the amount of journal subscriptions for the library.

This leaves the faculty to rely on the Interlibrary Loan Service. This is a service the library provides to obtain books and journals from other institutions. Burckel and Kapitanski said the process

English department given extension

LESLIE NACHTRAB
staff reporter

The Sept. 19 deadline for departments to submit their lists of academic journals to cut from Farrell Library's subscription list has come and gone, but the Department of English is taking more time.

The library has asked the department to make a possible 30-percent cut, which is $4,000, from its yearly periodical subscription budget of $13,600.

The two-week time period in which the department had to make the cuts concerned faculty. It asked for a reprieve by the library, and it was granted.

"We want to be careful not to put any individual's scholarly interest on the chopping block," said Lawrence Rodgers, English department head.

Steve Heller, professor of English and director of the creative writing program, said he feels his area of interest will suffer from the cuts.

"The serious cancellation will have a devastating effect on the creative writing program at Kansas State as the library cuts those journals that faculty and students need in their education," Heller said.

Elizabeth Dodd, associate professor of English, said working with other universities might alleviate the burden on K-State's English department.

"Larry Rodgers has asked to have an entire year so that we can coordinate with other universities," Dodd said. "It would be terrible, for example, if all the universities in Kansas cut the same journals. Then we wouldn't be able to rely on interlibrary loans."

The department is also unhappy and surprised that it was asked to make the same magnitude of cuts as the science departments.

"Unlike the science departments, the library is the only lab we have," Rodgers said. "So cutting out our journals is for us tantamount to cutting off 30 percent of our building."

"The half-life for a number of journals, say in science, is extremely short, because the technology in them is constantly changing," he said. "The half-life for an English journal is 25 years plus. We need those journals on the shelf now, because we can't predict what people are going to need in 2020."

Teams must travel elsewhere to do library research

JAMI NELSON
staff reporter

The cancellation of periodicals at Farrell Library will force the K-State debate and forensics teams to look elsewhere when researching.

To deal with the lack of resources, the teams already travel to the University of Kansas several times a semester to complete their research, Craig Brown, forensics coach, said.

The preference to research at KU has resulted because its library possesses a greater concentration of resources in humanities and social sciences. K-State provides more access to periodicals in the scientific fields, Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said.

These university libraries face inflation problems complicated by the rising cost of periodicals. The information necessary to the speech teams is even harder to access. Brown said this could lead to a competitive disadvantage for the teams.

In addition to the cancellation of in-house journals, the university faces the possibility of losing a significant database, Lexis/Nexus, because of rising costs.

Lexis/Nexus is a full-text, general-interest database of business, law and social science, Hobrock said.

"We make it available as a general database here in the library," he said. "It's heavily used by undergrads."

In the past, Farrell had purchased a subscription to the database for $12,500 per year for unlimited access through four ports used by the College of Business Administration, the speech department and the library. This amount included an educational discount offered by Lexis/Nexus. If the university were required to pay the commercial subscription, they would have paid $850,000 last year if monitoring the metered usage.

The planning for the event begins around March or April and a theme is developed. This year's theme is "Toward the 21st Century: A Multiracial Destiny of Harmony and Equality."

Baker said the theme for this year is one based on President Clinton's ideas concerning racial and ethnic harmony. She said she thinks Clinton has addressed the need to talk about race relations and knows there is a need to start those discussions.

"This is a week to make people think about the 21st century, think toward the future," Baker said. "The 21st century is going to be quite diverse and this week will build to looking toward the future."

One of the goals for Baker is to help develop the concept of a celebration and awareness week that other schools and communities can use.

Baker said another goal is to always get representatives from both the campus and community. The planning committee identifies speakers and local people to do workshops and programs on different topics. The goal is to improve communication. This year a new full-day workshop will be focused on the needs of Manhattan and the campus communities.

"Normally we address the global issues and now we are specifically addressing issues here," Baker said.

The workshop will be given by First Circle, a consulting organization. Baker said they replaced the keynote speaker with the workshop this year. The workshop is an attempt for community and campus leaders to work with the presenters.

"The first step to better understanding multiracial diversity is understanding yourself," she said. "Education is also the key to getting people to embrace each other more and understand people more."

this issue," DeJong said.

Some students and administrators at other schools said there is a difference between counseling students not to drink — as the law requires — and encouraging them to use common sense if they do drink.

"They want to preach abstinence, but they also have to talk about the dangers," said Ashesh Shah, president of the MIT residence hall council.

At Dartmouth College, three-quarters of the students have said in surveys that they understand the policy that says no one younger than 21 can drink. But fewer than a quarter say they obey it.

"It's a terrible dilemma," said Lee Pelton, dean of the college.

"What you hear deans say is, 'Boy, if the drinking age was 18, then we could have programs revolving around responsible drinking.' So there's this hidden culture of drinking that goes on that we can't respond to."

Dartmouth pinpoints high-volume drinkers in high-risk environments such as fraternities and focuses alcohol education programs on them, Pelton said.

During debate on the original resolution, Agriculture Sen. Bret Glendening said he agreed with the idea, but confusion about the system and about students' opinions was too great to take any kind of action.

"I know that if we had a plus system and it actually went through as a plus system, it would make this university a better place, and it might actually help," he said. "Obviously, there's a lot of confusion. There's some iffy areas about the plus grading system, and there's some people in here who don't know exactly where the majority of students on campus stand on this issue. Vote this down and we can work on it more in the future when we have given all information to the students on this campus."

After the vote, Neufeld said she could see a need for more discussion about grading system changes.

"There's a lot of confusion out there. Maybe the best thing is to come back and regroup and see what other avenues we could take to improve the system," she said.

takes, on average, about two weeks.

"We use the Interlibrary service a lot," Kapitanski said. "It would make a lot more sense just to buy the materials because we use it so much."

Burckel expressed concern when graduate students would come into his office and ask questions that could be normally answered in journals.

Burckel used the analogy that "we had to choose between butter or more guns during World War II, with the latter being chosen. No soldier would go without a life-saving weapon, but butter would have to be sacrificed.

"We need to choose between campus scenery or a larger volume of books and journals," Burckel said. "The library is the intellectual heart of the campus, not the grass outside of it.

"The students have been the leaders and motivators in the past. They pushed university administrators to renovate the existing library," Burckel said. "Now they need to push university administrators to get more journals in their new library."

K-STATE QUARTERBACK Michael Bishop is tackled on a quarterback scramble in the 23-20 win against Ohio. Next up for Bishop and the Cats is No. 3 Nebraska.

CRASH COURSE

Saturday is exam day for K-State quarterback Michael Bishop. The test proctor: No. 3 Nebraska.

STORY BY SAM FELSENFELD

Imagine you're a student at a community college. Say, Blinn Community College in Texas, for example.

You've been taking classes for a while — some have challenged you, others have been easy, but none have been too difficult for you.

Now, suddenly, you're taking a final exam tomorrow in the toughest class that Harvard's graduate school has to offer.

Now, suddenly, you're K-State quarterback Michael Bishop.

Bishop has been perfect in college, amassing a 27-0 record through two years at Blinn and three games with the Wildcats. But tomorrow, it's not Coffeyville or Northern Illinois or Bowling Green — it's the No. 3 Nebraska Cornhuskers.

The biggest game Bishop has played was when Blinn beat Coffeyville on Dec. 7 to win its second-consecutive community college national championship.

Nebraska hasn't lost in its past 38 home games and hasn't lost to K-State since Nov. 9, 1968 — four days after Richard Nixon won his first presidency.

When Bishop reads the defense before taking his first snap against the Huskers, though, he won't be up against any community college players. He'll be staring into the eyes of Nebraska's Jason Peter and Grant Wistrom, who ESPN draft expert Mel Kiper considers to be two of the three best senior defensive linemen in the country.

"He knows he's gonna be hit. He's just got to be ready for that. He's gotta stay tough and just be able to bounce back," said quarterbacks coach Matt Miller, who started behind center for the Cats in their 1995 game at Nebraska.

"That's part of the game of football, and that's what makes Nebraska's defense so good is they're strong, they're physical and they're fast. To go up there thinking he's not gonna be hit, he'd be silly. But he's just got to learn to bounce back and shake it off and go out there on the next."

Bishop will need to keep the Cats' passing attack moving because K-State hasn't had much success running the ball against the Huskers in recent years.

In the past three games with Nebraska, the Cats have rushed for a total of -1 yards against the Huskers.

"They're good," Bishop said. "Everybody knows they have a good defense and a good offense. I think they'll maybe overlook us, but it's not a good thing to overlook us. We have a team that can explode at any point in time. It's gonna be a tough game."

While he's working the system, Bishop will also have to throw accurate passes against Nebraska's tight defense, something he hasn't always done consistently in K-State's first three games.

He's leading the Big 12 Conference in passing with an efficiency rating of 170.2, but he's only completed 48 percent of his passes.
